Although they were friendly to the first white men, the Indians were later treated badly. They taught the white men how to plant corn and traded with them. However, the expanding population drove the Indians westward. At first they seldom fought, but when the little land they had left was invaded, and when their chief source of life, the buffalo, was killed for fun, they began to fight fiercely. They were excellent warriors but they fought back too late. As the Indians were defeated or signed treaties, white men gave them the pleasure of living on crowded reservations, usually consisting of poor land.

Who was the real savage?

Mr. President, on behalf of myself and a number of other Senators, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to provide economic assistance to the American Indians.

Mr. President, this year, Congress will appropriate billions of dollars to take care of people outside of the United States of America. It is incumbent upon Congress, therefore, to appropriate $20 million to service properly the needs of the American Indians living on reservations throughout the United States. It is a fitting commentary that year after year we are failing to appropriate sufficient sums to care for these native Americans as to their health, education, social welfare, employment, relocation, loans for housing, and chances to earn a decent income.

The U.S. Senate Subcommittee To Investigate Juvenile Delinquency has held hearings in four areas in North Dakota on or near the Standing Rock Indian Reservation, Fort Berthold Reservation, Turtle Mountain Reservation, and Fort Totten Indian Reservation. Hearings were also held in Phoenix, Ariz., and Palm Springs, Calif., which covered Indian reservations in New Mexico, Arizona, California, and parts of Colorado, Utah, and Nevada. Further hearings were held in Montana, affecting Indian tribes in Montana, Wyoming, and Idaho. Proposed hearings in Washington, Oregon, and Oklahoma had to be postponed. Hearings before the Senate Indian Affairs Subcommittee and conferences held by Glenn Emmons, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, also revealed much evidence of conditions on Indian reservations. During the course of these hearings, much evidence was received in the form of testimony, charts, schedules, and statistics pointing to the great needs and problems of the Indian people. A detailed report was submitted to the Congress on the findings and recommendations as a result of these hearings and other material gathered by the staff through research.

However, it is necessary to report briefly on health, education, welfare, relocation, law and order, poor living conditions, low incomes, and the need for employment which make it mandatory that this bill for $20 million to aid the economy of the Indians be seriously considered by the Congress of the United States.

HEALTH

In the field of health, we find that the Indians in practically every part of the country are suffering from chronic and contagious illnesses. Statistics show that the tuberculosis rate of the Indians is 121.1 per 100,000 as compared with 22.5 per 100,000 of the total population of the United States. The pneumonia and influenza death rate among Indians is 114.9 per 100,000 as compared with 31.3 per 100,000 of the total population. Further, it should be noted that there were 91.7 deaths of Indians under 1 year of age per 1,000 births, as compared with a rate of 31.5 per 1,000 live births of non-Indians. A survey of the Papago and Navaho Indians shows that the infant mortality rate in those 2 reservations was approximately 50 percent. The life expectancy of the American Indian is 17 years as compared with the national average of 69 years.

Among the greatest needs to improve the health conditions of the American Indian, naturally, are more money, hygienic facilities, and clinics. Dr. Shaw, of the Health Branch of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, has stated that in a recent program inaugurated in the State of Washington, astounding improvement was shown in the health of the Indians in that State. With comparable funds, amazing improvements can likewise be realized in the 25 remaining States which contain Indian reservations.

EDUCATION

Despite the fact that we in this country take great pride in our public school educational system, it is unbelieveable that on the Navaho Reservation in the 1952–53 school year, out of 28,000 children between the ages of 6 and 18, less than 6,000 attended school. With the passage of the Navaho-Hopi Rehabilitation Act, there are now 22,751 children between the ages of 6 and 18 in school, and the remaining number who are not in school are expected to enroll within the next year or so.

This is one perfect example of the achievement of remarkable results after Congress has acted to remedy a crying need, as it has done in its rehabilitation program for the Navaho and Hopi Tribes. Testimony taken on the Papago Reservation shows that 60 percent of the Papago Indians do not speak English. Statistics such as these are reflected on Indian reservations throughout the country.

WELFARE

One of the greatest needs on the Indian reservations is for expert community counselors and qualified welfare workers. Many State welfare departments are attempting to give service on reservations, but meager funds for this purpose result in a service which, where existent, is on a "too little and too late" basis. Special Federal appropriations for the development of additional child-welfare services in Indian reservations would, in the long run, save the still larger sums which will be required to pay the costs which will be involved in caring for neglected youngsters grown into adult liabilities of the community.

The Indian Bureau has pointed out that the child-welfare workers, in many instances, are unable to do any counseling whatsoever because of the limited staff, and the main duties performed are only the processing of applications for welfare.

RELOCATION

Much has been said of the advantages of the relocation of the American Indians from the overcrowded reservations to areas where they can obtain year-around employment and better housing. However, the program is grossly inadequate and the services rendered to the relocated families are ineffective because of the very small appropriation for such purposes. It is a known fact that since the relocation program has started there has been in the past years on the various Indian reservations so great an increase in the birthrate that the relocation program does not noticeably reduce the number remaining on the reservations.

Another great need in the relocation program is to assure the Indians who are relocated that they will receive the services which are provided for them on the reservation until they are able to adjust themselves to their new environment. This would greatly reduce the number—30 percent—who return to the reservations because of the lack of these services outside the reservations.

LAW AND ORDER

One of the biggest problems on the Indian reservation is that of effective law and order. In a recent congressional report on Indian affairs a very pertinent observation was made on law and order which gives a clear picture of the situation on any Indian reservation. The need for adequate law and protection is urgent. Although the tribes are making a commendable effort to cope with the situation, much still remains to be done. The existing conditions contribute to lawlessness, a breakdown of morals and morale, and an increase in delinquency, which becomes a great burden upon the people.

In 1951 the Indian Bureau requested of Congress and the Budget Bureau an appropriation of $1,400,000 for its law-and-order program. It was cut down to approximately $350,000. Imagine a law-enforcement program being cut down to approximately one-fourth of what it asks for. Imagine Washington, D.C., having a police force reduced by 75 percent in the face of increased need for protection. What could we expect here? Testimony from police officer, Pat Nelson, on the Navaho Indian Reservation revealed that the reservation needs 38 additional police officers, plus 20 additional vehicles to transport them over the 25,000 square miles they are supposed to cover.

In North Dakota we found the same crying need for law-enforcement services. In a hearing before the subcommittee it was testified that one officer takes care of all Indian reservations in Montana and a part of Wyoming. The testimony also divulged that because of the insufficient funds for personnel and facilities, only the more serious offenses can be dealt with.

POOR LIVING CONDITIONS AND LOW INCOMES

Testimony adduced before the Juvenile Delinquency Subcommittee in North Dakota, Arizona, California, and Montana pointed to the primitive living conditions under which the Indians live. Imagine a mother, father, and 13 chilren living in a one-room cottage with no flooring, no utilities, no water, and no sanitation.

It took only a little money appropriated by Congress in 1954 for the Ute Mountain and Southern Ute Tribes to make it possible for the Utes, in the southwestern corner of Colorado, to construct model three-bedroom bungalows for all the families. These homes are comparable to the fine homes that the average American workingman lives in. This is another indication of what an adequate appropriation from Congress can do for the betterment of the living condition of the American Indians.

LIVING CONDITIONS

The low-income level of the Indians is reflected in statistics which show that some Indian families receive an annual income, from all sources, of as low as $400 a family a year. Families receiving $1,200 or more are in the minority. In comparable areas the non-Indian family's income is usually $2,500 or more a year.

Certain Indian reservations have been fortunate, through Government and private activities, to be located near industries which afford year-round jobs for the Indian people. An extension of such a program is greatly needed to raise the income level of the average Indian family.

At a meeting called jointly by the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG] and myself on January 7, 1957, in my office, Senators and Members of the House of Representatives from 11 States met with representatives of the Department of Defense, Office of Defense Mobilization, Department of Interior, Department of Commerce, and two Senate subcommittees. There were two primary subjects of discussion: First, a plan to bring more industrial plants to or near the various Indian reservations in the United States; and second, to urge the continuing operation of the Turtle Mountain ordnance plant at Rolla, N. Dak., which hires almost exclusively Indian skilled labor in the production of jewel bearings for defense and other purposes.

After fully discussing both of these issues for almost 3 hours, in summary these points were reached: First, the Indian people have proven themselves as capable and industrious, and have an excellent record of average daily attendance on the job. It was pointed out that at the Rolla jewel-bearing plant in North Dakota, the turnover of employees was only 3 percent, whereas in a similar plant in Massachusetts, employing non-Indian labor, the turnover of employees was 100 percent; second, the Indian people, contrary to some public belief, have adapted themselves to a special type of skilled labor; third, industrial plants have now been established on or near Indian reservations in Rolla, N. Dak.; Gallup, N. Mex.; Flagstaff, Ariz.; Cherokee, N.C.; Lame Deer, Mont.; Casa Grande, Ariz.; and Zuni, N. Mex. There are also under consideration plants in Oklahoma and Wyoming, and in the area in close proximity to the borders of Washington, Oregon, and Idaho on the McNary site; fourth, it was pointed out that many Indian reservations have the facilities for industrial power availability of water, including the use of power, transportation, available sites for expansion, and a stable source of labor supply; fifth, the Indian leaders on all Indian reservations have expressed the desire for industrial plants to be brought onto or near the Indian reservations to stabilize the economy of the Indian people. This not only will provide salaries for workers, but will aid other factors in the stabilizing of the economy of these communities. At the same time it will permit Indians to obtain jobs near their reservations and near their families and cultures, rather than force them to go to large cities away from their families and traditions. This is especially significant, since the relocation program cannot possibly absorb enough Indians to stabilize the economy of the Indian people living on the Indian reservations; and, sixth, the Indian people through their leaders have expressed the desire to provide for themselves and their children by obtaining stable and gainful employment, so that they may become self-sustaining, and not have to depend, any more than is necessary, on the services accorded by the Federal and State Governments. Not only will they be more self-sustaining economically, but it will further establish in them the strong family and community pride that has always been a part of the Indian people.

Summarizing the views on the reasons for continuing the Rolla plant, other than those expressed above, it was pointed out: First, that more than 50 million jewel bearings are needed to accommodate the defense needs of this country; second, that only approximately 3,600,000 jewel bearings are in storage at this time; third, that the Rolla plant is the only available source of jewel bearings in this country; fourth, that Russia produces more than 200 million jewel bearings each year, and is not dependent upon outside sources for jewel bearings; fifth, that Switzerland, which is, and has been, a source of supply of jewel bearings to the United States, in the event of war may be stopped in some fashion by Russia from either the production or the distribution of jewel bearings for the use of the United States; sixth, that without question jewel bearings are an essential ingredient of almost all phases of our defense activities, whether in the production of missiles, equipment, or transportation facilities; and, seventh, that the differential in cost and the quantity of production has reached the point where it is feasible to continue production at Rolla.

Mr. President, the passage of this bill will be one of the most significant steps taken by Congress to date in the administration of Indian affairs. The signatures of the distinguished Senators cosponsoring the bill are evidence of its importance to the welfare of our Indian citizens.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill, together with the names of its sponsors, be printed at this point in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, and that the bill lie on the table for 4 days so that other Senators may cosponsor it if they so desire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will be printed in the RECORD and will lie on the desk for 4 days.

The bill (S. 953) to provide economic assistance to the American Indians, introduced by Mr. LANGER (for himself, Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota, Mr. MAGNUSON, Mr. MANSFIELD, Mr. KEFAUVER, Mr. CHAVEZ, Mr. MUNDT, Mr. CHURCH, Mr. JACKSON, Mr. MURRAY, Mr. BIBLE, Mr. KERR, Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. ANDERSON, and Mr. MCGEE), was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it is the purpose of this Act to provide programs of assistance to the American Indian tribes and their members in the establishment upon Indian reservations of industries and other activities which will provide employment and otherwise improve the economic status of such Indians, and to provide programs for encouraging the establishment by private enterprise of industries and other activities on or near Indian reservations which will provide employment and otherwise improve the economic status of the Indians residing upon such reservation.

SEC. 2. (a) The Secretary of the Interior (hereinafter referred to as "the Secretary") is authorized to formulate and carry out programs designed to carry out the purposes of this Act. In carrying out such programs the Secretary is authorized—

(1) to make loans or grants to Indian tribes for the establishment of tribal enterprises or activities designed to carry out the purposes of this Act;

(2) to make or guarantee loans to individual Indians for the establishment by such individual Indians of enterprises or activities which, in the opinion of the Secretary, will aid in carrying out the purposes of this Act;

(3) to make or guarantee loans to non-Indians for the establishment or expansion of enterprises or activities which, in the opinion of the Secretary, will aid in carrying out the purposes of this Act;

(4) to furnish to Indian tribes or to individual Indians technical information and assistance necessary to enable them to establish and operate enterprises and activities designed to carry out the purposes of this Act.

(b) Loans and grants under this act shall be made upon such reasonable terms and conditions as the Congress shall approve upon recommendation by the Secretary including, in the case of loans to non-Indians, such assurances as may be necessary to guarantee preferred employment will be given to Indians in the operation of enterprises and activities established or expanded through loans made under this Act.

SEC. 3. The Secretary shall transmit to the Congress during the month of January in each year a complete report of his activities under this Act during the preceding calendar year.

SEC. 4. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $20,000,000 to be available until expended for carrying out the provisions of this Act.

PERMISSION FOR CERTAIN ALIEN CREWMEN TO REMAIN IN THE UNITED STATES IN EXCESS OF 29 DAYS

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the Immigration and Nationality Act, permitting foreign shipowners to retain a minimum number of crew members aboard their vessels laid up in American ports.

Under present law, foreign crews may not remain in the United States more than 29 days; consequently, foreign owners who desire to keep certain essential members of their crews aboard at all times are disinclined to use American ports for periods of layup and repair. Therefore, American shipyards are being deprived of substantial revenue which would otherwise flow to them as a result of necessary repairs and upkeep of foreign flag vessels laid up in U.S. ports. This proposed legislation would have a salutary effect upon private shipyards throughout our Nation. As an example, the port of Baltimore is ideal for the layup of ships because of its natural protection from severe weather. Our ship-repair facilities are excellent and have an international reputation. Furthermore, a number of foreign shipowners have expressed a strong desire to take advantage of these ship-repair facilities but for the present U.S. laws prohibiting the retention of essential crew members on board their ships in excess of 29 days.

Enactment of this proposal would benefit all American ports. Furthermore, it would have no adverse effect upon the enforcement of our immigration and customs laws. When one considers that every time a ship is idle for any appreciable period, it requires from $75,000 to $200,000 in ship repairs and maintenance to return it to active service, a technicality of our immigration laws should not deprive our American ship-repair yards and, more generally, the economies of our American ports of this additional income.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 954) to authorize the Attorney General to permit certain alien crewmen to remain in the United States in excess of the 29-day period provided for under the Immigration and Nationality Act; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(See the remarks of Mr. BUTLER when he introduced the above bill, which appear under a separate heading.)

PROPOSED CIVIL RIGHTS LEGISLATION

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, the President's message on civil rights was presented to the Senate today. In pursuance of the objectives set out by the President, on behalf of myself, the junior Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL], and the senior Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS], I introduce, for appropriate reference, 6 of the 7 bills to implement 6 of the points made in the message. The other bill was introduced earlier today by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER].

I should like to have the bills lie on the desk for an indefinite period, inasmuch as many Members of the Senate will be away next week. I prefer to submit the bills and leave them open for signature, for whoever may wish to affix his name.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. LANGER. As the ranking Republican member of the Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights of the Committee on the Judiciary, I inform my distinguished friend that the Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights has stated it would not have hearings until 6 weeks after bills were submitted to the committee.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes.

Mr. LANGER. Therefore, since the Senator has mentioned an indefinite period, I state that the longer the bills are on the desk the longer will be the delay in having a hearing.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I wish to say to my friend from North Dakota, it is assumed we may finish the so-called Federal-aid airport bill tomorrow. Then comes Lincoln Week, and a good many Members will be away. Whether the Members will have an opportunity to subscribe to the bills remains to be seen. Not much could be accomplished next week. When I referred to an indefinite period, I certainly did not intend to go beyond next week.

Mr. LANGER. I simply wanted to have the Senator understand.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I understand. There is no disposition on my part to delay. I am simply taking into consideration the reality of the situation which confronts us.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In order that Senators may understand, is it correct to state the Senator is asking that the bills lie on the desk 1 week?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, to make it definite, I ask unanimous consent that the bills lie on the desk for 1 week, in the interest of certainty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bills will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bills will lie on the desk 1 week.

The bills, introduced by Mr. DIRKSEN (for himself, Mr. KEATING, Mr. SALTONSTALL, and Mr. JAVITS), were received, read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated:

To the Committee on the Judiciary:

S. 955. A bill to amend chapter 73 of title 18, United States Code, with respect to obstruction of court orders;

S. 956. A bill to amend chapter 49 of title 18, United States Code, to punish flight to avoid prosecution for unlawful destruction of educational or religious structures;

S. 957. A bill to provide for the retention and preservation of Federal election records and to authorize the Attorney General to compel the production of such records; and

S. 960. A bill to amend the Civil Rights Act of 1957 to afford the Civil Rights Commission an additional 2 years within which to submit its final report, and for other purposes.

To the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare:

S. 958. A bill to assist in meeting the costs of special professional services needed in carrying out public school desegregation programs, and for other purposes; and

S. 959. A bill to amend Public Laws 815 and 874, 81st Congress, to provide for the education of children of members of the Armed Forces in communities in which the public schools are closed.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bills just introduced by me may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bills are as follows:

S. 955

A bill to amend chapter 73 of title 18, United States Code, with respect to obstruction of court orders

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That chapter 73 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof a new section as follows:

"Whoever corruptly, or by threats or force, or by any threatening letter or communication, willfully prevents, obstructs, impedes or interferes with or willfully endeavors to prevent, obstruct, impede or interfere with the due exercise of rights or the performance of duties under any order, judgment, or decree of a court of the United States which (1) directs that any person or class of persons shall be admitted to any school, or (2) directs that any person or class of persons shall not be denied admission to any school because of race or color, or (3) approves any plan of any State or local agency the effect of which is or will be to permit any person or class of persons to be admitted to any school, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not more than two years, or both.

"No injunctive or other civil relief against the conduct made criminal by this section shall be denied on the ground that such conduct is a crime.

"This section shall not apply to an act of a student, officer or employee of a school if such act is done pursuant to the direction of, or is subject to disciplinary action by, an officer of such school."

SEC. 2. The analysis of chapter 73 of such title is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"1509. Obstruction of certain court orders."

A bill to amend chapter 49 of title 18, United States Code, to punish flight to avoid prosecution for unlawful destruction of educational or religious stuctures

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That chapter 49 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof a new section as follows:

§ 1074. Flight to avoid prosecution for destruction of educational or religious structures.

Whoever moves or travels in interstate or foreign commerce with intent either (1) to avoid prosecution, or custody, or confinement after conviction, under the laws of the place from which he flees, for willfully damaging or destroying or attempting to damage or destroy by fire or explosive any building, structure, facility, or vehicle, if such building, structure, facility, or vehicle is used primarily for religious purposes or for the purposes of public or private primary, secondary, or higher education, or (2) to avoid giving testimony in any criminal proceeding relating to any such offense—shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

Violations of this section may be prosecuted in the Federal judicial district in which the original crime was alleged to have been committed or in which the person was held in custody or confinement or in the Federal judicial district in which the person is apprehended.

SEC. 2. The analysis of chapter 49 of such title is amended by adding thereto the following:

A bill to provide for the retention and preservation of Federal election records and to authorize the Attorney General to compel the production of such records

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That every officer of election shall retain and preserve, for a period of three years from the date of any general, special, or primary election at which candidates for the office of President, Vice President, presidential elector, Member of the Senate or Member of the House of Representatives are voted for, all records and papers which come into his possession relating to any application, registration, payment of poll tax or other Act requisite to voting in such election, except that, when required by law, such records and papers may be delivered to another officer of election and except that if a State designates a custodian to retain and preserve these records and papers at a specified place, then such records and papers may be deposited with such custodian, and the duty to retain and preserve any record or paper so deposited shall devolve upon such custodian. Any officer of election or custodian who willfully fails to comply with this section shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.

SEC. 2. Any person, whether or not an officer of election or custodian, who willfully steals, destroys, conceals, mutilates or alters any record or paper required by section 1 to be retained and preserved shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

SEC. 3. Any record or paper required by section 1 to be retained and preserved shall, upon demand in writing by the Attorney General or his representative directed to the person having custody, possession, or control of such record or paper, be made available for inspection, reproduction, and copying by the Attorney General or his representative.

SEC. 4. Any record or paper demanded pursuant to section 3 shall be produced for inspection, reproduction, and copying at the principal office of the person upon whom such demand is made or at an office of the United States attorney in the district in which such records or papers are located.

SEC. 5. Unless otherwise ordered by a court of the United States, neither the Attorney General nor any employee of the Department of Justice, nor any other representative of the Attorney General, shall disclose any record or paper produced pursuant to this Act, or any reproduction or copy, except as is necessary in the performance of his official duties, including presentation of any case or proceeding before any court or grand jury.

SEC. 7. As used in this Act, the term "officer of election" means any person who, under color of any Federal, State or local law, statute, ordinance, regulation, authority, custom or usage, performs or is authorized to perform any function, duty or task in connection with any application, registration, payment of poll tax or other act requisite to voting in any general, special or primary election at which candidates for the office of President, Vice President, presidential elector, Member of the Senate or Member of the House of Representatives are voted for.

A bill to assist in meeting the costs of special professional services needed in carrying out public school desegregation programs, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) the Congress recognizes that (1) prior to May 17, 1954, the Constitution of the United States had been interpreted as permitting public schools to be segregated on racial grounds provided such schools afforded equal educational opportunities; (2) on May 17, 1954, the Supreme Court of the United States ruled that under the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution segregated education is inherently unequal; (3) the Constitution as interpreted by the Supreme Court of the United States is the supreme law of the land; (4) State and local governments and agencies which had relied upon the separate-but-equal doctrine are now obligated to take steps toward the elimination of segregation in their public schools; and (5) many of these governments and agencies are faced with serious financial and educational problems in making the necessary adjustments in their existing school systems.

(b) It is therefore the intent of Congress and the purpose of this Act to assist State and local governments and agencies in carrying out their constitutional obligations by sharing certain of the additional expenditures directly occasioned by desegregation programs and by providing information and technical assistance in connection therewith.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 2. (a) For the purpose of assisting State and local educational agencies which, on May 17, 1954, maintained segregated public schools to effectuate desegregation in such schools in a manner consistent with pertinent Federal court decisions, there are hereby authorized to be appropriated for each fiscal year such sums as the Congress may determine.

(b) Appropriations under this section shall be available for grants to help finance:

(1) costs incurred by local educational agencies in the provision of supervisory or administrative services, pupil-placement, school-social-worker, or visiting-teacher services, and other special, nonteaching, professional services, the need for which is occasioned by the desegregation of their public schools, and

(2) costs incurred by State agencies in developing and carrying out State policies and programs for desegregation in public schools, including technical assistance to local educational agencies in connection therewith.

ALLOTMENTS AND PAYMENTS TO STATES

SEC. 3. (a) The Commissioner of Education (hereinafter called the "Commissioner") shall for each fiscal year allot to each State, from the sums appropriated pursuant to section 2 for such year, an amount which bears the same ratio to such sums (or to such larger sum as may be specified in the Act making the appropriation) as the number of students who attended segregated public schools in such State during the school year 1953–1954, bears to the number of students who attended such schools during such year in all the States. The number of students who attended segregated public schools in each State during the school year 1953–54 shall be estimated by the Commissioner on the basis of the best available data on the average daily attendance of local educational agencies during such school year.

(b) From a State's allotment under subsection (a) for a fiscal year, the Commissioner shall, except as otherwise provided in section 5, pay to such State an amount equal to one-half of the expenditures of local educational agencies in carrying out the purposes specified in section 2(b)(1) under applications approved by the State agency (designated as provided in section 4(a)(1)) pursuant to the State plan approved under section 4, and one-half of the expenditures of such State agency in carrying out the purposes specified in section 2(b)(2) under such plan, including its expenditures in administering the State plan. Payments under this section (and section 5) shall be made from time to time by the Commissioner on the basis of estimates of amounts to be expended in a quarter or other period or periods determined by him, with necessary adjustments on account of any overpayment or underpayment for any prior period or periods.

STATE PLANS

SEC. 4. (a) A State plan shall be approved by the Commissioner for purposes of this Act if such plan—

(1) designates the State educational agency to administer or supervise the administration of the plan, or designates another single agency of the State for such purpose and in such case provides methods for effective coordination between such agency and the State educational agency;

(2) sets forth the methods and criteria for approving applications of local educational agencies for funds under this Act, and describes the activities to be carried on by the State agency with the aid of funds under this Act;

(3) provides such accounting, budgeting, and other fiscal methods and procedures as are necessary for the proper and efficient administration of the State plan;

(4) provides that the State agency will make such reports to the Commissioner, in such form and containing such information, as are reasonably necessary to enable the Commissioner to assure expenditure of grants under this Act solely for the purposes for which made and otherwise to perform his functions under this Act.

(b) Whenever the Commissioner, after reasonable notice and opportunity for hearing to the State agency administering or supervising administration of the State plan approved under subsection (a), finds that—

(1) the State plan has been so changed that it no longer complies with any of the requirements of subsection (a), or

(2) in the administration of the plan there is a failure to comply substantially with any such requirement, the Commissioner shall notify such State agency that no further payments will be made to the State under this Act (or, in his discretion, that further payments to the State will be limited to parts of or programs under the plan not affected by such failure), until he is satisfied that there will no longer be any failure to comply. Until he is so satisfied, the Commissioner shall make no further payments to such State under this Act (or shall limit payments to parts of or programs under the State plan not affected by such failure).

LOCAL AGENCY APPLICATIONS

SEC. 5. If the Commissioner determines, with respect to any State for which an allotment has been made under section 3(a) for any fiscal year, that such State will not for such year submit and have approved a State plan under section 4, and either (a) that such State has consented to the making of applications by local educational agencies pursuant to this section, or (b) that such State has indicated that it assumes no responsibility with respect to the desegregation of public schools, the Commissioner shall, notwithstanding the provisions of section 3(b), pay to local educational agencies, with applications approved by him under this section, one-half of the expenditures of such agencies during such year in carrying out the purposes of section 2(b)(1), but such payments may not exceed, in the aggregate, the State's allotment for such year. The Commissioner shall by regulation prescribe criteria and procedures, for approval and withdrawal of approval of applications under this section, which will, in his judgment, best effectuate the purposes of this Act.

A bill to amend Public Laws 815 and 874, 81st Congress, to provide for the education of children of members of the Armed Forces in communities in which the public schools are closed

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) subsection (a) of section 6 of the Act of September 30, 1950 (Public Law 874, 81st Congress), relating to arrangements for the provision of free public education for children residing on Federal property where local educational agencies are unable to provide such education, is amended by inserting after the first sentence the following new sentence: "Such arrangements to provide free public education may also be made for children of members of the Armed Forces on active duty, if the schools in which free public education is usually provided for such children are made unavailable to them as a result of official action by State or local governmental authority and it is the judgment of the Commissioner, after he has consulted with the appropriate State educational agency, that no local educational agency is able to provide suitable free public education for such children."

(b) (1) The first sentence of subsection (d) of such section 6 is amended by adding before the period at the end thereof: "or, in the case of children to whom the second sentence of subsection (a) applies, with the head of any Federal department or agency having jurisdiction over the parents of some or all of such children."

(2) The second sentence of such subsection (d) is amended by striking out "Arrangements" and inserting in lieu thereof "Except where the Commissioner makes arrangements pursuant to the second sentence of subsection (a), arrangements".

SEC. 2. (a) Section 6(b)(1) of the Act of September 23, 1950 (Public Law 815, 81st Cong.), relating to applications for school construction projects with respect to which Federal aid is requested, is amended by striking out "and" at the end of clause (F), by striking out the period at the end of clause (G) and inserting in lieu thereof "; and", and by adding after clause (G) the following new clause:

"(H) assurance that such agency will make the school facilities included in any such project, the application for which is approved after enactment of this clause, available to the Commissioner pursuant to section 10(b)."

(b) Section 10 of such Act, relating to arrangements for facilities for the provision of free public education for children residing on Federal property where local educational agencies are unable to provide such education, is amended by inserting after the first sentence the following new sentence: "Such arrangements may also be made to provide, on a temporary basis, minimum school facilities for children of members of the Armed Forces on active duty, if the schools in which free public education is usually provided for such children are made unavailable to them as a result of official action by State or local governmental authority and it is the judgment of the Commissioner, after he has consulted with the appropriate State educational agency, that no local educational agency is able to provide suitable free public education for such children."

(c) Section 10 of such Act is further amended by inserting "(a)" after "SEC. 10." and by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(b) Whenever the Commissioner determines that—

"(1) any school facilities with respect to which payments were made under section 7 of this Act pursuant to an application approved under section 6 after the enactment of this subsection are not being used by a local educational agency for the provision of free public education, and

"(2) such facilities are needed in the provision of minimum facilities under subsection (a), he shall notify such agency of such determination and shall thereupon be entitled to possession of such facilities for purposes of subsection (a), on such terms and conditions as may be prescribed in regulations of the Commissioner. Such regulations shall include provision for payment of rental in an amount which bears the same relationship to what, in the judgment of the Commissioner, is a reasonable rental for such facilities as the non-Federal share of the cost of construction of such facilities bore to the total cost of construction thereof (including the cost of land and off-site improvements), adjusted to take into consideration the depreciation in the value of the facilities and such other factors as the Commissioner deems relevant. Upon application by the local educational agency for the school district in which such facilities are situated and determination by the Commissioner that such agency is able and willing to provide suitable free public education for the children in the school district of such agency to whom section 10 is applicable or upon determination by the Commissioner that such facilities are no longer needed for purposes of subsection (a), possession of the facilities shall be returned to such agency. Such return shall be effected at such time as, in the judgment of the Commissioner, will be in the best interest of the children who are receiving free public education in such facilities, and in the light of the objectives of this Act and the commitments made to personnel employed in connection with operation of such facilities pursuant to arrangements made by the Commissioner."

CIVIL RIGHTS—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 75)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

Two principles basic to our system of government are that the rule of law is supreme, and that every individual regardless of his race, religion, or national origin is entitled to the equal protection of the laws. We must continue to seek every practicable means for reinforcing these principles and making them a reality for all.

The United States has a vital stake in striving wisely to achieve the goal of full equality under law for all people. On several occasions I have stated that progress toward this goal depends not on laws alone but on building a better understanding. It is thus important to remember that any further legislation in this field must be clearly designed to continue the substantial progress that has taken place in the past few years. The recommendations for legislation which I am making have been weighed and formulated with this in mind.

First. I recommend legislation to strengthen the law dealing with obstructions of justice so as to provide expressly that the use of force or threats of force to obstruct court orders in school desegregation cases shall be a Federal offense.

There have been instances where extremists have attempted by mob violence and other concerted threats of violence to obstruct the accomplishment of the objectives in school decrees. There is a serious question whether the present obstruction-of-justice statute reaches such acts of obstruction which occur after the completion of the court proceedings. Nor is the contempt power a satisfactory enforcement weapon to deal with persons who seek to obstruct court decrees by such means.

The legislation that I am recommending would correct a deficiency in the present law and would be a valuable enforcement power on which the Government could rely to deter mob violence and such other acts of violence or threats which seek to obstruct court decrees in desegregation cases.

Second. I recommend legislation to confer additional investigative authority on the FBI in the case of crimes involving the destruction or attempted destruction of schools or churches, by making flight from one State to another to avoid detention or prosecution for such a crime a Federal offense.

All decent, self-respecting persons deplore the recent incidents of bombings of schools and places of worship. While State authorities have been diligent in their execution of local laws dealing with these crimes, a basis for supplementary action by the Federal Government is needed.

Such recommendation when enacted would make it clear that the FBI has full authority to assist in investigations of crimes involving bombings of schools and churches. At the same time, the legislation would preserve the primary responsibility for law enforcement in local law enforcement agencies for crimes committed against local property.

Third. I recommend legislation to give the Attorney General power to inspect Federal election records, and to require that such records be preserved for a reasonable period of time so as to permit such inspection.

The right to vote, the keystone of democratic self-government, must be available to all qualified citizens without discrimination. Until the enactment of the Civil Rights Act of 1957, the Government could protect this right only through criminal prosecutions instituted after the right had been infringed. The 1957 act attempted to remedy this deficiency by authorizing the Attorney General to institute civil proceedings to prevent such infringements before they occurred.

A serious obstacle has developed which minimizes the effectiveness of this legislation. Access to registration records is essential to determine whether the denial of the franchise was in furtherance of a pattern of racial discrimination. But during preliminary investigations of complaints the Department of Justice, unlike the Civil Rights Commission, has no authority to require the production of election records in a civil proceeding. State or local authorities, in some instances, have refused to permit the inspection of their election records in the course of investigations. Supplemental legislation, therefore, is needed.

Fourth. I recommend legislation to provide a temporary program of financial and technical aid to State and local agencies to assist them in making the necessary adjustments required by school desegregation decisions.

The Department of Health, Education, and Welfare should be authorized to assist and cooperate with those States which have previously required or permitted racially segregated public schools, and which must now develop programs of desegregation. Such assistance should consist of sharing the burdens of transition through grants-in-aid to help meet additional costs directly occasioned by desegregation programs, and also of making technical information and assistance available to State and local educational agencies in preparing and implementing desegregation programs.

I also recommend that the Commissioner of Education be specifically authorized, at the request of the State or local agencies, to provide technical assistance in the development of desegregation programs and to initiate or participate in conferences called to help resolve educational problems arising as a result of efforts to desegregate.

Fifth. I recommend legislation to authorize, on a temporary basis, provision for the education of children of members of the Armed Forces when State-administered public schools have been closed because of desegregation decisions or orders.

The Federal Government has a particular responsibility for the children of military personnel in federally affected areas, since armed services personnel are located there under military orders rather than of their own free choice. Under the present law, the Commissioner of Education may provide for the education of children of military personnel only in the case of those who live on military reservations or other Federal property. The legislation I am recommending would remove this limitation.

Sixth. I recommend that Congress give consideration to the establishing of a statutory Commission on Equal Job Opportunity Under Government Contracts.

Nondiscrimination in employment under Government contracts is required by Executive orders. Through education, mediation, and persuasion, the existing Committee on Government Contracts has sought to give effect not only to this contractual obligation, but to the policy of equal job opportunities generally. While the program has been widely accepted by Government agencies, employers and unions, and significant progress has been made, full implementation of the policy would be materially advanced by the creation of a statutory Commission.

Seventh. I recommend legislation to extend the life of the Civil Rights Commission for an additional 2 years. While the Commission should make an interim report this year within the time originally fixed by law for the making of its final report, because of the delay in getting the Commission appointed and staffed, an additional 2 years should be provided for the completion of its task and the making of its final report.

I urge the prompt consideration of these seven proposals.

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 5, 1959.

STATUTORY RIGHTS OF INDIVIDUALS

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Speaker, the President has sent to the Congress, today, an important message on constitutional and statutory rights of individuals, and the rule of law, under our system of government.

It is a temperate message. It is a moderate message. It is a message of the golden mean.

It would be repetitious for me to discuss the seven specific recommendations of the President, so soon after the reading of the message, but I do commend its careful reading and deep study to every citizen who is interested in solving one of the difficult problems of our time.

STATE COMPACT REGARDING UNIFORM TAX TREATMENT OF NONRESIDENTS

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing a bill on behalf of myself and my Democratic colleagues granting the consent of Congress to the several States to enter into compacts providing for the uniform tax treatment of nonresidents.

An interstate compact can obtain substantial relief and is much more likely to obtain congressional support than a constitutional amendment. To begin with, the compact bill we are offering requires only a simple majority in both Houses of Congress. In giving its approval, Congress is merely authorizing the States to work out reciprocal tax agreements regarding nonresidents. When those agreements have been made, the States will be further required to submit their compacts to Congress for ultimate approval.

If the States can work out amicable agreements there will be no difficulty in obtaining final congressional approval. Under the measure we are sponsoring, consent is not limited to the States engaged in tax controversy with New Jersey but is available to all of the States. Such States, for example, as North and South Dakota, Maryland, and Virginia, are presently having nonresident tax difficulties and under our legislation will be authorized to enter into separate agreements.

We hope that Pennsylvania and the city of Philadelphia in particular will follow the lead of the State of New York and ameliorate the unfair wage tax it presently levies on New Jersey residents who work there.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that leave of absence be granted to the following Members of the House: Messrs. MEADER, MILLER of New York, and CHELF. They will be absent on official business through February 17.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 12, HOUSE MEETS AT 10:30 A.M.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Thursday next when there will be a joint meeting in connection with the 150th anniversary of the birth of President Abraham Lincoln, the House meet at 10:30 o'clock a.m.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

AUTHORITY TO DECLARE A RECESS

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Thursday next the Speaker may declare a recess at any time during that day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

EXTENDING UNIVERSAL MILITARY TRAINING ACT

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 2260) to extend until July 1, 1963, the induction provisions of the Universal Military Training and Service Act; the provisions of the act of August 3, 1950, suspending personnel strengths of the Armed Forces; and the Dependents Assistance Act of 1950.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 2260 with the gentleman from California [Mr. SISK] in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 30 minutes.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, the bill before the House today, the bill to extend the draft, is one of the most important bills that will be considered by the 86th Congress during this session.

It is a Department of Defense bill.

It is a bill that involves the security of our Nation.

As far as I am concerned, we have no choice but to pass this bill.

Now the bill does four things:

First, it extends the authority to induct individuals for a period of 24 months into the Armed Forces from the present termination date of July 1, 1959 to July 1, 1963, a period of 4 years.

Secondly, it extends the so-called doctor's draft law from the present termination date of July 1, 1959 to July 1, 1963, a period of 4 years.

Third, it extends the suspension on strength limitations of the various armed services from July 1, 1959 to July 1, 1963, a period of 4 years.

Fourth, it extends the Dependents Assistance Act from July 1, 1959 to July 1, 1963, a period 4 years. This is the law under which enlisted personnel with dependents receive increased allowances.

Now, I am going to go into detail on all of these laws, but I would like to take them in order.

First, the extension of the draft.

Mr. Chairman, no one in the Congress, I am sure, would favor a draft bill unless it were absolutely necessary. But we all know that we face a serious challenge to our national security. We have got to maintain an armed force in excess of 2½ million men for the foreseeable future. And in order to maintain this force, we have got to have some form of compulsion on the statute books.

Mr. Chairman, we are a peace-loving nation. We are not a nation made up of military-minded people.

As a result, there is a limit to the number of individuals who will volunteer for military service, if all forms of compulsion are removed.

No one likes to vote for a draft law, but we must all measure up to the responsibility imposed upon us by the Constitution and by the American people.

We have no choice but to vote for this bill, in order to maintain our Armed Forces at the strength deemed necessary to assure our continued existence as a free nation.

Now let me tell you something about the history of the draft.

We passed the draft law in 1940 before the outbreak of World War II. That act finally expired, after several extensions, in March of 1947. At that time the Armed Forces were at a strength of approximately 1,380,000.

But the services were having difficulty in maintaining that strength.

In 1948 it became apparent to President Truman that a reenactment of the Selective Service Act of 1940 would be necessary in order to maintain the strength figures that had been suggested.

At that time the Air Force was short some 25,000 recruits, and the Army was 129,000 below its authorized strength of 669,000.

At the same time the President and the Congress decided that because of world conditions we would have to expand our forces to approximately 2 million.

Now remember this was just before Korea. In other words, we were having trouble maintaining a force of 1,380,000 by voluntary methods and we knew we would need a draft law if we attempted to expand to a force structure of 2 million people.

Today we know that the defense of the country requires a minimum force of 2,525,000 men.

Mr. Chairman, if we were not able to maintain a strength of 1,380,000 in 1948 on a purely voluntary basis; if it took a draft law in 1948 to attempt to reach a larger force structure of 2 million men, it must be perfectly obvious that we cannot attain a force structure of 2½ million on a purely voluntary basis today.

Now since 1948 we have passed many laws to improve the attractiveness of a service career. Our reenlistment rates have increased; our officer retention rates have improved; and the money that has been spent on increased pay and benefits for the armed services has undoubtedly increased the efficiency and stability of our Armed Forces.

But we are still a long way from a purely voluntary force. We still have to fill the gap between the recruit and the trained specialist. Our trained specialists are reenlisting at a better rate. But before these men become specialists they have already spent several years in the Armed Forces.

I mention all of this because I am convinced, as is the Committee on Armed Services, that the only way we can maintain a force structure of 2½ million men in our armed services is to continue the draft law on the books for another 4 years.

Now, let me refresh your memories on how the draft law operates.

Every young man upon attaining the age of 18 must register with his local draft board. He remains liable for induction up to age 26, and if he is deferred for any reason that liability is extended to age 35. Now the committee inserted this extended liability provision in the law in 1951 deliberately. The idea came from the Committee on Armed Services, and not from the Department of Defense. We put this in the law so that men who obtained deferments in essential industry would not do so to escape the draft. These men remain liable up to age 35 and it has had a very salutary effect upon those who might otherwise have sought to obtain deferments merely to escape their military obligation. And, of even greater importance, it stabilized the college deferment program by assuring local boards that college deferments would not open an escape route for some registrants.

Now there are 4,012 local draft boards throughout the United States and its possessions. There are also 93 appeal boards with extra panels.

And I would like at this time to pay a high tribute to those loyal citizens who serve on the local boards and appeal boards. There are over 38,000 American citizens representing about 90 percent of all selective service personnel who work without pay. As a matter of fact, the Selective Service System only employs about 6,000 full-time and part-time civilians. The entire appropriation for the Selective Service System is only $27,500,000 annually.

These local boards have the job of registering and classifying these young men.

It is not an easy job, and it is made more complicated, of course, by regulations which change from time to time as conditions change.

These boards must decide who will be drafted and who will be deferred.

We very deliberately placed this responsibility in the hands of the local boards and not in the hands of officials here in Washington. The Congress felt, quite properly, that local boards, who are familiar with local conditions, should make the determination as to who of their neighbors must be drafted.

This is a tremendous job. There are over 20 million registrants in the Selective Service System. Of course, these are the total registrants since 1948. Many of them have already served in the Armed Forces, or many of them are now serving in the Armed Forces, but it is quite a job keeping track of all of these individuals. I think the Selective Service System does a magnificent job and is to be congratulated for the fair and impartial manner in which the System operates.

Now the law, as you know, provides for deferments and it also provides for some limited exemptions. It also provides that no one can be inducted under the age of 19 if there is someone in that local board area who is available and is over the age of 19.

General LeMay, in referring to the effect that the draft law has on voluntary enlistments in the Air Force, said:

> The very fact of its existence causes many men, in preference to being drafted, to enlist in the Regular Air Force, the Air Force Reserve, the Air National Guard, or to enter the Air Force Reserve officer training program.

General LeMay also stated that he appeared before the committee to express the unqualified support of the Department of the Air Force for the bill to extend the draft.

The Commandant of the Marine Corps, General Pate, said:

> Although the Marine Corps is a volunteer organization, extension of the induction provisions of the Universal Military Training and Service Act is essential to its manpower program.

Vice Admiral Russell, of the Navy, testified:

> During the brief period in 1947 and 1948 when there was no draft act in effect there was a very serious drop in the average quality of volunteer enlistees in the Navy, although this was a relatively low input period. I am convinced that without the influence of the induction authority of the Universal Military Training and Service Act, there would be a definite reduction in the quality of our volunteers.

The Navy, the Marine Corps, and the Air Force all testified that without the draft law they could not obtain the volunteers that are necessary to maintain the strengths and quality of their respective services.

In the next fiscal year, the Navy will attempt to maintain a budgeted strength of 630,000; the Air Force will attempt to maintain a budgeted strength of 845,000; and the Marine Corps will attempt to maintain a budgeted strength of 175,000. We know that they cannot maintain these strengths without the draft law.

The Army will attempt to maintain a strength of 870,000 and they know that they cannot come anywhere near this figure without using inductees.

These are the budgeted strengths for fiscal 1960. This contemplates a force structure in excess of 2,500,000 men. And the only way that it can be attained and maintained at this minimum strength is through the enactment of this proposed legislation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we had a fine hearing on this bill.

I would like now to discuss some of the points that were raised during these weeks' hearings which I am sure are in the minds of many Members.

The first point is why we need a 4-year extension of the induction authority. The question has been raised "why not a 2-year extension, or a 1-year extension, or a 3-year extension? Why do we need a 4-year extension?"

There are many answers to this problem. First of all, if precedent has any significance, I should mention that in 1951 we extended the draft law for a 4-year period to 1955, and in 1955 we extended the draft law for a 4-year period until 1959. The same arguments that existed in 1955 are even more significant today.

We are no closer to a peaceful settlement of world conditions in 1959 than we were in 1955. So if the Congress was justified in its action in 1955, it is even more justified in extending the draft law for a 4-year period in 1959. But let us look beyond that.

What does the 4-year draft extension do?

First. Well, it indicates to the free world and any would-be aggressor, our determined effort to maintain a strong national defense system.

Second. We make clear to the world, and to the American people, the extent to which we assume our responsibility among the free nations of the world.

And of equal importance, the youth of America is not deluded into expecting an early end to the draft. Thus, they will not be seeking temporary deferments with the hope that the draft will expire before their turn is reached. They will be able to plan with more certainty for their schooling. They will have a greater opportunity to choose a time to serve voluntarily.

Third. It permits more orderly administration procedures in all of the services—personnel planning can be made on a 4-year basis. This is of significance in procurement programs, training programs, and even in the maintenance and operation of training bases.

In that connection, let me quote a statement made by General Taylor, Chief of Staff of the Army, in connection with the necessity for a 4-year draft extension.

General Taylor said:

As I look at the future and consider the manpower requirements of our country, I can't see anything in the international situation that suggests a reduced requirement for manpower below that essentially which we have now.

Furthermore, these studies of our ability to support our Armed Forces by enlistment alone, suggest that about a million and a half men is the maximum. It is inconceivable to me that we could defend our security with any force like a million and a half men in the foreseeable future.

I make the other point, that for stability of our military planning, of our military program, we must be able to project ourselves at least 4 years into the future. A shorter period of time from the point of view of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, for example, is virtually meaningless. We must have this stability in our planning, which is based in this case upon knowing about what manpower we can count upon.

Finally, I would just say that in the present international climate any reduction of the time of our draft extension would suggest, I am afraid, to our allies, that perhaps we don't think the situation is particularly serious, and I think it would have serious adverse psychological impacts abroad as well as at home.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON. I yield.

Mr. GROSS. I wonder if General Taylor is equally concerned about the psychology of the people of the United States of America when they learn that the British may abolish their draft altogether in 1960?

Mr. VINSON. There is no evidence in the record. England has a draft for 24 months. Some 15 or 16 NATO countries have drafts for varying periods of time.

Mr. GROSS. There is nothing in the record to show that. Let me read from your own hearings. This is referring to the British:

Current policy contemplates terminating conscription in 1960.

Mr. VINSON. The record shows that in England today the draft is 24 months. That is exactly what the record shows.

Mr. GROSS. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. VINSON. I yield.

Mr. GROSS. What difference does it make what it is today if they are going to abolish it?

Mr. VINSON. There is no statement issued by the British Government. There have been statements in the press, but there is no definite policy. Whether or not England does abandon it, our position in the world today demands that America keep it.

Mr. GROSS. I am interested in the people of this country. I am not interested in extending the draft to please some foreign country.

Mr. VINSON. We are not extending the draft to please some foreign people. We are extending the draft for the reason that our minimum force structure requires 2,500,000 men. We cannot obtain that number without the draft law, and we are extending it a reasonable length of time so that there can be orderly planning, orderly handling of the manpower, which will all reflect in economy in managing the whole Department of Defense.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. KILDAY. In connection with the statement by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GROSS], about Great Britain, I will ask him if he is reading from the hearings, and if he read, "The current policy contemplates termination of conscription in 1960. However, it is understood the British Government has also said some form of conscription would be necessary if voluntary recruitments fail." Has the gentleman read that?

Mr. GROSS. Can the gentleman tell me how you can terminate conscription and still have it?

Mr. KILDAY. I wanted to point out the full statement in the record, that there is a commitment from the British Government that should their reenlistment continue, it would not be necessary.

Mr. GROSS. I would like to ask the gentleman if this is some more British doubletalk.

Mr. KILDAY. I am not able to interpret that.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON. I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Is it not true that if the British do abolish their draft it is all the more important for us to keep strong?

Mr. VINSON. The gentlewoman from Massachusetts hits the nail exactly on the head.

Mr. GROSS. Apparently there are those who believe we should continue to fight the battles for the British. Sure.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, the next question to which I wish to address myself is the time of extension. This will be debated when our distinguished new colleague, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WOLF] offers an amendment. He has advised me he proposes this afternoon to offer an amendment to cut the length of time to 2 years. We will have more to say on that.

From the historical standpoint, we extended the draft in 1951 to 1955; and in 1955 we extended it to 1959. The history of the extension of the draft has been mainly along the line of a 4-year extension. This makes for far better administration. The 38,000 men throughout the country who compose the draft boards, and these boys who are getting deferments—the whole machinery—will have a better climate within which to operate than they would if we merely extend it for 2 years.

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON. With pleasure.

Mr. MEYER. The gentleman spoke of history; how about more than 150 years of history as compared with just the past few years of history?

Mr. VINSON. I can only go back in recent history; I cannot go back 150 years. Let me say, however, that the history of the draft in the United States from 1917, which was the first time the draft was resorted to since Civil War days, has been one of extensions for 4-year periods.

Mr. MEYER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, the simple fact is this: In spite of the reductions in our Armed Forces, which will be the subject of future debate on this floor, I am sure, I have seen no evidence submitted by anyone that indicates that our international commitments have lessened, or will lessen in the years ahead.

We know that the cold war will continue. We know that there will probably be future Lebanons, and future Formosas. And it just is not fair to hold out a hope for the elimination of the draft over the next 4 years.

But if our voluntary enlistment rates by some miracle do reach a point where we no longer need the draft law, then the Congress will be here to terminate the induction authority, if that becomes necessary.

Now do not think for a moment that the Army is the only service that needs a draft law. The draft law is just as important and probably more so to the Navy, the Marine Corps, and the Air Force. And do not think for a moment that the Army itself would not like to terminate the draft if they could. The Army would like to be a purely voluntary force and not have the constant problem of retraining personnel facing them all the time.

The Army would prefer volunteers. But when they cannot get all volunteers they have to get some inductees. But those inductees make good soldiers. And they do give the Army something which is irreplaceable in a national defense system—a variety of skills. They only get these people for 2 years, but then they have a reserve obligation for a short period thereafter. The Army gets college graduates as well as high school graduates; they get physicists, chemists, engineers, just as they get young graduates from high schools.

They get a cross section of America through the draft law which enhances our national security.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to turn to the question of the draft age.

Today men are liable for induction between the ages of 18½ and 26, and those who have been deferred remain liable up to age 35.

The average age of involuntary induction today is 22½ years and this will increase to about 23 years during the next 4 years.

Now immediately some will say that we should be drafting younger men.

First of all, let me tell you that 50 percent of the inductees who enter the Army today do so on a voluntary basis. They can volunteer for induction at the age of 17 with their parents' consent, and at 18 without parental consent. Many thousands of young men enter the service in this manner.

These men volunteer for induction for a 2-year period either before or after they have completed their formal education. They choose the time when they want to fulfill their military obligation.

Others wait until they complete their education before entering the service and some of these are involuntarily inducted. Obviously, these men are going to be older since they have gone to college.

Some of these may be approaching the age of 26. Some of them are in their 25th or 24th year. But all of these young men have had an opportunity to volunteer for induction.

They have all had an opportunity to volunteer for the other services for a longer time if they so desired.

If we lower the draft age, by law, from 26 to a lower age, we may seriously disrupt college deferment programs, and it is possible, depending upon the future size of the Armed Forces, that we may have to induct fathers.

Today we do not induct fathers. I think we all agree that this is a good policy. The impact upon the community is much greater when a father is inducted than when a nonfather is inducted. By inducting nonfathers we lessen hardship throughout the Nation.

If we lower the draft age by law, then local boards, in an effort to keep men from escaping all military service, will certainly cease to be liberal with their present deferment policies. Now I mention this because there has been a great deal of discussion about the draft age.

I think I should tell you that the law itself permits the President, when he sees fit, to draft by age group or age groups.

In other words, the President could decide tomorrow to induct only those who are in the 21st- or 22d-year age group. Or he could induct those who are in the 19-year age group.

But here we are dealing with statistics and the so-called manpower pool.

I think you will be interested to know that on November 30, 1958, of all those who were then 26 years of age and who were registrants under the draft law, 9 out of 10 qualified registrants had fulfilled their military obligation or were in the process of fulfilling their military obligation. Now, of course, those are qualified registrants.

Of the total registrants on November 30, 1958, who were 26 years of age, including those not qualified, 7 out of 10 had fulfilled their military obligation, or were in the process of fulfilling their military obligation.

This is very significant to keep in mind. You have heard a lot of talk about the chances of being drafted are about 1 in 10.

That does not tell the story. We take in approximately 500,000 men a year into our armed services. They go in as voluntary recruits, as inductees, or as 6 months' trainees. And it is perfectly obvious that the total number of individuals inducted only represents about 20 percent of the total number of men entering our armed services.

But do not overlook the fact that all these come out of the same and only manpower pool.

Now the reason why we have more registrants than qualified registrants is also obvious.

Under existing physical and mental standards, which were raised last year by an act of Congress, 33 percent of all registrants are classified as 4–F.

That is, 33 percent of all registrants are physically, mentally, or morally disqualified for service in our Armed Forces.

To this must be added those who are deferred for hardship reasons because they are supporting families or for other hardship reasons. Then there is a small group of individuals who are deferred because their work involves national security.

But I repeat, on November 30, 1958, 9 out of 10 of the qualified registrants under the Universal Military Training and Service Act had completed their military obligation or were in the process of completing their military obligation.

Last year, as I mentioned, we gave the President the authority to increase the mental and physical standards for induction into the Armed Forces. This has greatly improved the efficiency of the Army and as a result, three out of five Army disciplinary barracks have been closed.

Certainly, this action on the part of the Congress increased the 4–F deferment rate, but on the other hand, it drastically reduced the number of men who were confined to disciplinary barracks in the Army or who were discharged after short periods of time because they were found unqualified for military service.

After all, we are concerned about the security of this country and we are concerned about the quality of the men in whom we place this great responsibility. Those men must be physically and mentally qualified to perform their duties. That is the reason we gave the President the authority to raise the physical and mental standards last year.

Now, the second objective of the bill is the extension of the so-called doctor's draft law.

Now, just what is the doctor's draft law?

Well, as you know, we defer students to go to college.

Medical and dental students require longer deferments because their training takes a longer period of time.

As I previously stated, the law says that anybody deferred for any reason remains liable up to age 35.

Now, these doctors and dentists who have been deferred to complete medical or dental school incur a draft liability up to age 35.

The law also gives the President the authority to make special calls from among those who are in medical or dental categories.

As a result, these people are liable for induction, but actually they aren't being inducted because we give them an opportunity to apply for a Reserve commission and then they are ordered to active duty for 24 months.

They come on active duty as Reserve captains in the Army and the Air Force, or as lieutenants in the Navy, and they also qualify for special pay.

Now, how many of these doctors do we have on active duty?

As of November 30, 1958, the Army had 1,629 Regular officers who were physicians, and 2,198 physicians who were Reserve officers. Of these 2,198 Reserve officer physicians, 1,579 entered the Army as a result of the doctor's draft law. They weren't drafted, but they entered as Reserve officers because of the doctor's draft law.

In the Navy, as of November 30, 1958, there were 1,626 Regular officer physicians and 1,672 Reserve officer physicians. Of this number, 1,186 Reserve officer physicians entered on active duty as a result of the doctors' draft law.

In the Air Force, there were 1,144 Regular officer physicians and 2,274 Reserve officer physicians. Of these 2,274 Reserve officer physicians, 1,700 entered the Air Force as a result of the doctors' draft law.

The average annual rate of physicians on active duty to total personnel is 3.4 physicians per thousand troop strength. This strength figure varies throughout the year, but the overall average is 3.4.

All told, as of November 30, 1958, there were 10,543 physicians on active duty in the Armed Forces.

Now let us look at the dentists for a moment.

In the Army there were 529 Regular dental officers, and 1,250 Reserve dental officers. Of these 1,250 Reserve dental officers, 1,012 entered on active duty as a result of the doctors' draft law.

In the Air Force there were 441 Regular dental officers and 1,336 Reserve dental officers and of these 1,336 Reserve dental officers, 996 entered on active duty as a result of the doctors' draft law. The average strength of dentists is two per thousand troop strength.

In the Navy there were 1,012 Regular dental officers, and 587 Reserve dental officers. Of these 587 Reserve dental officers, 513 entered on active duty as a result of the doctors' draft law.

All told, there were 5,155 dentists on active duty on November 30, 1958.

I believe it is important to note that all of the Reserve officers on active duty as a result of the doctors draft law entered on active duty prior to age 35. In addition, all of these doctors were at one time deferred to complete their education.

I think from these figures it is perfectly obvious that we would not be able to provide adequate medical and dental care for members of our Armed Forces if we did not have the doctors draft law in operation.

Now, the mothers and fathers of this Nation have a right to expect that their sons, when called into the military service, will receive the finest medical and dental treatment possible. And this is also true of the wives and children of these men who are serving our country. If we did not have the doctors draft law, we just would not be able to furnish this medical care.

Now let me discuss the third objective of the bill—the suspension of strength limitations.

Permanent law imposes a strength limitation on the size of the Army of 837,000 persons. And yet the budgeted strength for fiscal 1960 is 870,000. Permanent law imposes a maximum limitation on the size of the Air Force of 502,000, but the budgeted strength for fiscal 1960 is 845,000.

Now these limitations on the size of the Army and the Air Force, together with a lesser limitation on the size of the Navy, have been suspended by separate law until July 1, 1959. Thus, the third objective of the proposed legislation is to extend this suspension to July 1, 1963.

I think you could see what would happen if we did not extend this provision of law. The Air Force would drop from 845,000 to 502,000—a loss of 343,000 men; the Army strength would drop from 870,000 to 837,000, a loss of 33,000 men; and the Navy would lose about 4,000 regular Navy enlisted personnel.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I want to discuss the fourth objective of the proposed legislation—the extension of the Dependents Assistance Act—the law under which enlisted personnel draw increased allowances because of their dependents.

Under this law, enlisted personnel draw allowances ranging from $51.30 per month to $96.90 per month, depending upon their grade and the number of their dependents. This law is scheduled to expire on July 1, 1959, and if it is not extended, thousands and thousands of enlisted personnel would suffer pay cuts ranging from 25 percent to 50 percent of their pay.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have discussed with the membership the four objectives of the proposed legislation.

First. The extension of the regular draft law for 4 years.

Second. The extension of the doctors draft law for 4 years.

Third. The extension of the suspension on the limitation on the size of the Armed Forces for 4 years.

Fourth. The extension of the Dependents Assistance Act for 4 years.

These laws are all vital for our national security.

Each and everyone of them is an indispensable part of our defense program.

We, in the Congress, have the responsibility for raising and supporting armies and maintaining a navy. That responsibility is imposed by the Constitution of the United States. Enacting this bill represents the fulfillment of this responsibility.

Mr. Chairman, enacting this bill is also America's answer to the challenge of any would-be aggressor.

This is our reply to those who might think we are beginning to weaken internally.

This is our reply to those who feel that the American people will not face up to reality.

This, Mr. Chairman, is America's promise to the world that we will remain strong and that the young men of our Nation will continue to be trained and ready for a day, which we hope will never come.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. The distinguished gentleman from Georgia, who is one of the great Americans of all time—and I say that not flatteringly but in the most complimentary and sincere manner—has made a speech which certainly commands the attention of all of us, particularly those of us charged with responsibility as we are as Members of the Congress. The gentleman particularly referred to the fact that the main fight here might be on reducing the time to 2 years. If that amendment were adopted it would be construed abroad as a sign of weakness on our part. I hope the bill will not be amended in that fashion. I respect those who believe in that. Of course, they believe in the strength of America just as much as we do, and my remarks are not to be construed either directly or indirectly as any reflection upon those who think that way. However, if we are going to err we better err on the side of strength rather than on the side of a weakness.

When Mr. Mikoyan was over here he felt that with a Republican President and a Democratic Congress there would be a division, but he failed to recognize constitutional government and, over and above it all, we are Americans.

Mr. VINSON. I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts for his contribution. He is absolutely right. If it were flashed out to the world today that the House of Representatives had reduced the draft down to 2 years, in every chancery in the world it would be said that America has changed her policies, no longer is she going to be strong, no longer is she going to be the leading nation of the world for the free people and to maintain our liberties and our American way of life. We must not let this matter be eroded here by 2 years or any other period of time less than 4 years. It is absolutely essential for orderly administration to have the 4-year term.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARENDS. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. Is this a draft bill governing American forces or is it a draft bill to please foreigners? I would like to get that straightened out.

Mr. ARENDS. It is a draft bill governing only Americans, but we cannot get away from the fact that we are the No. 1 nation of the world today and what we here do reflects itself upon all the other nations of the world.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARENDS. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. The leadership of every country in the world is charged with the primary duty of doing those things, particularly in a crisis, that are for the national interest of that country, whether it be the United States, little Liberia or any other country. Without regard to what any other country might do, we are charged with taking a course of action that is in the national interest of our own country. I think this bill is decidedly in the national interest of our country. We are charged with our job here in America.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, I might suggest to the gentleman that if these countries are so interested in maintaining military forces, they first extend the obligated service of their own draftees. Very few have the obligated service that is required of conscripts in this country.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, there is little that I can add to the detailed explanation that has just been presented by the distinguished gentleman from Georgia, CARL VINSON.

He has given you a complete and thorough explanation of the need for this legislation and has fully justified every aspect of the bill.

I might add, parenthetically, that the Congress of the United States and the American people are fortunate indeed to have a man of Mr. VINSON's outstanding ability serving in the Congress of the United States and occupying the very responsible position that he does as Chairman of the Committee on Armed Services. Mr. VINSON is one of the few Members of Congress who was in this room when the Draft Act was passed in 1917.

As the distinguished chairman has stated, no one likes to vote for a draft law, but nevertheless we all have a responsibility and that responsibility must be met regardless of our personal desires and wishes.

We all devoutly hope for peace, but I know and you know, that peace today is not based upon hopes for mutual understanding and good will, but is based upon our ability to defeat, by force of arms, any would-be aggressor.

As much as we may hope and pray for peaceful solutions to all international problems, we all know that those problems will not be solved in the immediate future by embarking on a course of military weakness. In other words, much as we might desire, this whole matter will not just go away.

The proposed legislation, H.R. 2260, is the basic law under which we maintain the strength of our Armed Forces. It is an indispensable part of our manpower personnel program. Without it we know we cannot maintain the strengths necessary for our security. If we were not drafting a single man, this law would still be necessary as a stimulant for voluntary enlistments.

In many ways, the draft law is a tribute to the Christian principles of our people. We do not want war and our national heritage is based upon the principles of the freedom of man. Our young men are not military minded. As a result they do not volunteer in large numbers to become a part of a military system.

But they do recognize their obligation to the Nation and the necessity for maintaining our military strengths. So long as there is a draft law on the statute books, these young men will fulfill their obligation willing, and conscientiously. But remove this law from the statute books, and we will give these young men a false impression of the gravity of the world situation.

The distinguished chairman from Georgia has discussed with the membership why we must extend this law for 4 years. He has discussed with you the induction age and many other subjects that were thoroughly studied during the hearings.

As a result, the Committee on Armed Services recommends to the membership of this House the enactment of the proposed legislation with one technical amendment.

We might just as well face the facts of life and not attempt to delude the American people into a false sense of complacency with regard to the length of time that this law must remain in operation.

A 4-year extension of this law is necessary not only because of its effect upon the free nations of the world; not only because of its effect upon the career planning of our young men; not only because it enhances personnel planning in the Department of Defense; not only because it enhances procurement programs; but most important of all, because it demonstrates to the Soviet Union that we intend to remain strong in every military aspect.

Now Mr. Chairman, because the distinguished gentleman from Georgia has explained the functions of the draft law so well, I thought I would spend just a few moments to discuss with the membership the Doctors Draft Law.

Under the Universal Military Training and Service Act, authority is provided for the Secretary of Defense to issue separate calls for men qualified as physicians and dentists. H.R. 2260, as amended, will extend this authority until July 1, 1963.

There is no question about the need to provide proper medical care for members of the Armed Forces and their dependents.

The simple facts are that too few physicians and dentists choose a career in the Armed Forces to provide the minimum numbers of these specialists required for our 2½-million-man force, and their dependents scattered about the world.

In recent years, more physicians and dentists have entered the Regular services. The Armed Forces estimate that by June 30, 1959, about 50 percent of all physicians and about 40 percent of all dentists serving on active duty, will be career officers. But these are far too few. The services must rely for the balance of their needs on men required to perform 24 months of active duty under the draft law. Without compulsion, the services would be unable to attract even half the number of physicians and dentists they require.

Under present legislation, and under the proposed extension, the President has authority to order physicians and dentists from the Reserve to active duty for a period of 2 years. So long as enough of these specialists apply and are commissioned in the Reserve, the authority to order them for induction need not be used. But the authority to induct them is vital to induce them to apply for Reserve commissions. Then, when needed, physicans and dentists can be called to serve on active duty.

This authority to induct doctors has kept the services supplied with vitally needed medical and dental personnel.

The effect of the law has been to induce draft-liable physicians and dentists to seek Reserve commissions and enter on active duty as needed. As an added inducement, extra pay of $100 per month is provided for those physicians and dentists.

When we began to mobilize for the Korean war, the need for physicians and dentists was obvious. The first doctor draft law imposed the liability for service on physicians and dentists up to the age of 51. Priorities of liability were established based on the amount of prior service and whether a man had been deferred to study for these professions, or had received help from the Government to obtain schooling through service-sponsored World War II specialist training programs.

Those first to be called were physicians and dentists who had been deferred or had received their professional education at Government expense, and had served less than 90 days in the armed services. Priority II included those physicians and dentists who had been deferred or received help and who had served less than 21 months. Priority III were those without service after 1940; and priority IV were those with service who had not reached their 51st birthday, and were not in priorities I or II.

A nationwide system of advisory committees was created to advise local boards on community needs for physicians and dentists. This was necessary to provide for civilian needs, while meeting military requirements.

This effective and equitable way of supplying physicians and dentists and allied specialists to the armed services was extended for 2 more years in 1953.

There were some changes in the types of prior service recognized as affecting liability under the act, and some modification of the length of service required, also based on the amount of prior service. In general, the obligations on physicians and dentists were lightened by the 1953 amendments.

In 1954, provision was made for the utilization of these professional men in an enlisted status in cases where they either could not or would not serve as officers. Only 65 were inducted out of 12,000 requisitioned by the Department of Defense up to June 30, 1954.

In 1955, the authority to draft physicians and dentists was extended for 2 more years to July 1, 1957, but the upper age of liability was reduced to 46.

Then in 1957, the special priorities and age provisions of the former doctor draft legislation were dropped. Under the 1957 amendments to the Universal Military Training and Service Act, physicians, dentists, and allied specialists were made liable under the act as regular registrants and on the same terms as other registrants are liable, with two exceptions. Those exceptions are:

First. That the Department of Defense retained authority to issue separate calls for physicians and dentists.

Second. The President retained the authority to order medical and dental Reserve officers to active duty for 24 months without their consent.

Physicians and dentists are subject to the same ages of liability as are other registrants. And, like other registrants, deferments before age 26 for study, for occupational and other reasons, extend liability to age 35.

By virtue of this extension of liability provision of the act, practically all physicians and dentists acquire liability to age 35.

It is practically impossible for a man to complete his medical or dental study and training without a deferment. In the normal course of events a man is reached for induction before his 23d birthday. If he is not to be inducted, he must be deferred.

More than 12,000 physicians and 5,000 dentists have been requisitioned by the armed services. Only 83 have been inducted. In addition, more than 3,600 physicians are at present receiving additional training under the Armed Forces Reserve medical officer commissioning and residency consideration plan. The program is designed to give the services physicians with training in special fields. Early in 1955, the Director of Selective Service and the Department of Defense agreed to the program whereby a limited number of registrants who became Reserve officers are permitted to complete residency training before being called to active duty.

The Director of Selective Service recommends deferment of men selected by the Department of Defense for training under this program. It is a source of physicians with training in specialized fields and accounts for a large portion of the physicians required for active duty tours.

As mentioned above, while thousands of physicians and dentists have entered the Armed Forces under the stimulus of the doctor draft and the Universal Military Training and Service Act, only 83 have actually been inducted. This is a tribute to the success of the entire program.

Under H.R. 2260, as under present law, no doctor will be inducted if he applies for a Reserve commission and is rejected solely on the grounds of physical disqualification.

Such doctors who are members of Reserve components, and who are under 35, and have not performed at least 12 months of active duty, may be ordered to active duty for not more than 24 months.

Physicians or dentists who serve on active duty for 12 months or more as reservists shall upon release or within 6 months have an opportunity to resign the commission, unless they are otherwise obligated.

A physician or dentist qualified for a Reserve commission has a right to volunteer for active duty for 24 months so long as his service is needed.

Provision is made for appointment or promotion to a rank commensurate with experience and qualifications. Most doctors enter on active duty as captains in the Army and Air Force, or as lieutenants in the Navy.

The Armed Forces have not found it necessary to requisition physicians or dentists since February 1957. However, it is significant that with July 1, 1959, the expiration date of the doctor draft approaching, a decline has occurred in the numbers applying through the residency program or otherwise for Reserve commissions. There was some indication late last year than an induction call might have to be issued. In anticipation, the local boards had to order physicians for physical examination in order to be prepared to meet a possible call. But the ordering of physical examinations was enough. It prompted a renewal of applications for commissions and residency training sufficient to insure a continual supply of physicians at least until July 1, 1959.

This one recent example of how the doctor draft works is alone proof of its essentiality. And it is a strong argument, too, for a 4-year extension. No matter how obvious the need may be to continue the doctor draft, the very fact of its approaching expiration date has misled some doctors and dentists into a false belief that they will not be needed.

A survey conducted by the Council on National Defense of the American Medical Association covering the period January 1, 1956, to December 31, 1956, the latest available figures, indicates that more than 77 percent of physicians who had served on active duty and were separated from active duty during this period were satisfied with their assignments insofar as they pertained to their training and experience.

And as a final tribute to the administration of this essential law, I would like to mention that no physicians or dentists were inducted in fiscal 1958, and none have been inducted to date in fiscal 1959.

The law, in my opinion, is working satisfactorily and should be extended.

It is the only method by which we can assure the men in our services, and their families, as well as the mothers and fathers of young men being inducted, that adequate medical and dental care will be available for these people.

Mr. Chairman, I strongly urge the enactment of the proposed legislation as essential to the welfare and security of our Nation. We must extend the draft; we have no choice.

It interrupts medical and dental manpower planning and programs. A 4-year extension will leave no doubt in the minds of our young professional men that for most of them their careers must include 2 years in the armed services.

Now, before I conclude, Mr. Chairman, I would like to tell you what our replacement requirements for physicians in the Military Establishment will be over the next 4 years.

In fiscal 1960, we will need 1,950.

In fiscal 1961, we will need 1,400.

In fiscal 1962, we will need 1,900.

In fiscal 1963, we will need 1,375.

In that connection, I want to compliment the Department of Defense for the manner in which it has kept the ratio of physicians to troop strengths at a reasonable level.

In 1947, there was 6.6 physicians per thousand troop strength.

In 1948, there was 5.4 per thousand troop strength.

Since that time, the Department of Defense has made strenuous efforts to reduce this ratio, which is now 3.4 per thousand troop strength.

Not long ago there was some opposition on the part of the physicians to the fact that too much time was spent in nonprofessional duties which interfered with the practice of medicine.

This objection has now been overcome and it is interesting to note that only 2 percent of our physicians on active duty are engaged in staff or administrative duties, 11 percent are engaged in research, training overhead, in a travel status, or ill; 87 percent of all physicians on active duty are engaged in professional medical care.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I, too, would like to commend the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON], and also our ranking minority member, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARENDS].

Mr. ARENDS. I thank the gentlewoman.

Mr. HOLTZMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARENDS. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HOLTZMAN. I have heard the conclusion uttered twice that a 2-year extension might reflect our weakness throughout the world. Has the gentleman given any thought to the fact that extending the law for 2 years with a provision for review might, on the contrary, reflect confidence in our strength and security rather than weakness, and might also result in lessening the tensions created by the cold war?

Mr. ARENDS. I feel we have done exactly that in the action taken by our committee. From time to time we review this question. I have no quarrel with what the gentleman is thinking about. But in view of the danger presently facing us, and from the standpoint of planning in the Department of Defense for our manpower needs, I think we are best off in another extension for 4 years, as is provided in the bill before us.

Let me simply mention this in passing, that in the matter of procurement of doctors and dentists we have brought about more efficiency in the services, where today we find the need for doctors and dentists has been brought down to 3.4 per thousand troops. In other words, more efficiency is being gained today in the medical activities of the doctors and dentists in service than ever before.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARENDS. I yield.

Mr. GROSS. I am still not satisfied with the answer I have received with respect to satisfying foreigners. Were any representatives of foreign governments before the committee?

Mr. ARENDS. No; they were not.

Mr. GROSS. Are they going to be satisfied with 4 years?

Mr. ARENDS. Well, let us satisfy ourselves.

Mr. GROSS. I just thought maybe we could extend it for 8 or 10 years and then the lights would not go out in the chancelleries of foreign governments.

Mr. ARENDS. Let me say to my friend from Iowa that I tried to pinpoint that a moment ago—that we are not thinking in terms of compulsory military training solely for the people of this country, but at the present time due to the situation we face in a troubled and disturbed world, and the fact that we are spending untold billions of dollars, which every Member of this House will vote for, then why put a weak link in this whole chain which might weaken the defense of this country.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WOLF].

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Chairman, may I say I feel very strongly about my position on the 2-year extension as opposed to the 4-year extension.

Mr. Chairman, at this time I would like publicly to thank the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [M.. VINSON] for his many courtesies and kindnesses to me during the last few days. I would also like to call to the attention of my colleagues the inscription engraved in the walls of this Chamber above the Speaker's rostrum. If you will read these words of Daniel Webster and keep them in mind, I would like to read my statement.

I want to make it clear as I begin that I do not question whether at this time we need the draft. Rather, I agree that right now we need the draft because we have no prepared alternatives to offer in its place. But I do not accept the theory that we will never have an alternative to the draft. It is my firm belief that if we work diligently at this problem, before the end of this 2-year period we will have arrived at a solution in which we can maintain the needed rate of enlistment without the necessity of peacetime military conscription. Furthermore, my position is based on the necessity of strengthening our national military posture, because I do not believe that we are getting the kind of men necessary to run the military equipment we are spending billions to get.

Hence, any arguments I make must be considered within this frame of reference: Do our military manpower policies give us greater security or not? The administration's position on the question of an automatic 4-year extension of the draft has been put well by Assistant Secretary of Defense for Manpower, Personnel, and Reserve Finucane, who stated on page 35 of the committee hearings to the question presented by a member of the Armed Services Committee, and I quote: "Why not a longer period of time or a lesser period of time?" To this, Secretary Finucane said, and I quote: "I think your question is a good one, sir, historically the draft has in the wisdom of Congress been extended for 4 years and we would like simply for conformity's sake to carry on with the habits of the past."

Mr. Chairman, the administration's position forces every Member of this Congress to ask himself another question: Is conforming to the habits of the past going to give us adequate national security in the space age? I submit to you, gentlemen, that this is exactly what an automatic 4-year extension does. Why should we have a 4-year extension? Do we fear to face up to fundamental weaknesses in our present military system? We must ask ourselves if in the space age when the Soviet Bear is grinning and laughing at our faltering and futile gestures we are content for conformity's sake to carry on with the habits of the past. Are we so tired as as a people, are we so timid as legislators that we are willing to drift with the errors, inequities and false security given to us by our Selective Service System? I do not think the American people want to drift. I am sure that they want not the questionable habits of the past—not conformity—but deliberation and decisive action. It is within this context that we must ask ourselves what we are going to do about the draft extension.

Before I go on, let me reiterate that at this time I am for a 2-year extension of the draft. If a 2-year extension is voted down—I will vote for a 4-year extension rather than none at all, but with a heavy heart. I am voting for an extension not because I believe that the draft is a panacea but because we do not have any effective alternatives ready to use in place of the draft. It is my feeling that this is because we have been taking too lightly our obligation of reviewing in a comprehensive fashion the function and consequences of our military manpower policies. The extension of the draft for a full 4 years is an easy way out. It is a way whereby Congress is able to pass off its solemn obligation for another 4 years to consider the problems of the draft. If, on the other hand, the draft is only renewed for 2 years, Congress is obligated to consider the problem of the selective service within the next 2 years. A joint committee or a committee of the Armed Services Committee is obligated to return to this Congress with a report that will either give us alternatives or change the existing system. Gentlemen, the 4-year draft, I fear, is a continuation of the policy of having quantity with the illusion of protection rather than quality with the reality of security; it is a continuation of a drifting, shifting somnambulance which America can no longer afford.

Let me point out some of the serious and complex problems which our selective service and Reserve policies have either caused or not resolved. At the present time the Federal Government spends as much as $14,000 for the training of each draftee. Only 3 out of every 100 draftees reenlist after their 2-year term ends. The present high turnover of military personnel who are drafted constitute a great waste of the taxpayers' money, adds to our mounting cost of national defense and exerts an inflationary pressure on our national economy. More important, just as these men become trained and may be of some use to the armed services they leave after their 2-year training period. Liddell Hart, the British strategist and military historian has pointed out that the cost of training conscripts and other costs caused by the rapid turnover of short-term soldiers are not exceeded by gains in military power and military security. He states:

> Conscripts cannot be trained in 18 months or 2 years to the high grade of skill required for modern warfare, for by the time they are trained to even an employment level so little of their period of service remains that their employment is bad economy.

We are all aware of the fact that present military strategy demands not masses of men who are ill trained, but manageable groups of men well trained in the tactics of modern warfare, the techniques of tactical nuclear warfare, the use of newly developed complex weapons and weapon systems. We do not have this when we have a large pool of men in the armed services who are biding their time until they leave the services. It should also be pointed out that it is not only the draftee who spends his time doing tasks that could be performed by civilians. Let me state in passing that this system is being used by the Air Force. They have been able to replace 43,000 airmen with 31,000 civilians in one noncombat area. The Regulars also become involved in this syndrome of wasteful activity. A large proportion of them become absorbed in the training machine for conscripts, and in caretaker jobs at home and overseas. Do any of us here honestly believe that the 6-month active duty training program or the Air Force 10-week training program or even the 2-year military conscription program gives an enlisted man enough opportunity and training in the use of nuclear weapons so that he would be combat ready in even a limited war with these weapons?

We all recognize that during other great national emergencies democratic standards and ideals have had to be protected through the use of military conscription. This was accepted by our citizens during the Second World War because of the immediate necessity for mass armies and because conscription was universally applied. But now there is serious question as to the need for mass armies and further, under the present Selective Service System, more than one-half of the men in the eligible age group have by a combination of circumstances and means, including deferment, been excused from any form of military service. A large part of the burden of conscription has fallen unfairly upon youths who for economic reasons are unable to obtain draft deferment. These men cannot afford to attend college or must postpone marriage and the raising of a family.

According to John Graham, in a study prepared for the Fund for the Republic, there are as many as 60 ways for a young man to fulfill his military obligation without actually serving time in the draft. For example, in early 1957, the pool of draft-age men was about 5 million, of whom 2.3 million were fathers who consequently are indefinitely deferred under draft regulations. Conscientious objectors are deferred; many professional athletes will disqualify because of so-called physical handicaps; college students are deferred; scientists for the most part are deferred. By Executive order set forth in January 1956, men past 26 years of age are dropped to the bottom of the draft list. This has the effect of releasing these men from their military obligation. I am not arguing that these men should not be deferred. However, it is clear that the so-called universality of the system is nonexistent. Married students in college often have children to avoid going into the draft. Those who are unable to avoid the draft because of economic or social circumstances are the ones who must enter the Army at pay rates much lower than those prevailing in civilian life, thereby adding to their low economic status. Prof. John Galbraith, of Harvard, has asserted that "the draft survives principally as a device by which we use compulsion to get young men to serve at less than the market rate of pay. We shift the cost of military service from the well-to-do taxpayer who benefits by lower taxes to the impecunious young draftee." We are willing to have quantity with the illusion of protection rather than quality with the reality of security. As. Mr. Cordiner has pointed out in his now famous report:

> The modern military manpower problem reduced to its simplest terms is one of quality rather than quantity. It is not merely a matter of the total number of people on hand but is much more a matter of the competence, skill, and experience of these people. The military services are not able at present and under present circumstances to keep and challenge and develop the kinds of people needed for the period of time necessary for those people to make an effective contribution to the operation of the force.

As Gen. Harold Maddux, who directs the Defense Department's manpower requirements, said in May 1958:

We need dramatic changes in pay and attitudes to upgrade a military career in the eyes of the Nation. We can't get that change with huge numbers of men compelled to serve against their will.

We should not forget the harmful social costs which result from a draft which is universal in name but not in its functions. The draft is affecting adversely the lives of millions of young men and women who are facing the choice of further education, jobs, and marriage. John Graham has pointed out:

Uncertainties about the draft make it impossible for young men to plan ahead and as a result discourage them from getting the advanced training in the sciences or the professions which the country is needing increasingly.

The feeling of loss, insecurity, and uselessness is compounded for thousands and thousands of young men who are already caught up with the bewildering and perplexing problems of adolescence and young adulthood.

In brief then, we are able to see military, economic, and political reasons for extending the draft for only 2 years until that time when we will have more effective alternatives than the draft system.

If I may in my remaining few minutes, I would like to answer certain important questions which may be asked of me. Some of you may ask, if we extend the draft for 2 years only there will be men who will not enlist in the service or the Reserve programs, whereas if we extend the draft for 4 years these men will take seriously our intentions of continuing the draft. To this I answer: The armed services may always draft more men during this 2-year period if enlistments are falling behind. Furthermore, at the end of the 2-year period we hope that effective alternatives to the present system will exist so that those who do not have the ability or the will to serve will not have to serve. If, on the other hand, it appears after careful study that there are no other alternatives, Congress may continue the draft for another 4 years, and I shall certainly support this.

It is clear that the Armed Services Committee and the Rules Committee acted with great speed to bring before this Congress a bill for a blanket extension. If the study suggests that a draft is the only answer to our military manpower problems, the Armed Services Committee and the Rules Committee will not be derelict in asking for an extension. Some of you may suggest that the administration needs a 4-year extension in order to be able to plan rationally its manpower program. To this I would like to answer in Assistant Secretary of Defense for Manpower, Mr. Finucane's, terms:

Historically the draft has in the wisdom of Congress been extended for 4 years, and we would like simply for conformity's sake to carry on with the habits of the past.

From this statement it is clear that planning does not demand 4 years. Only conformity demands 4 years.

Some of you ask that the Cordiner report does many of the things that I suggest but we still need the draft. I suggest that the Cordiner report deals only with reenlistment not in attracting men into the services on the lowest level. Increases were percentagewise, which means that privates were only given $3 a month increase but generals were given as much as $70 a month increases.

Some of you may ask: Is not the draft needed to secure the services of the necessary unskilled manpower? Sufficient pay would attract such unskilled men as must be in uniform. It is foolish to waste skilled men by drafting them to do unskilled work. By rejecting those men in category IV, we are left with a body of men with a higher level of skill to do this unskilled work. It is a source of discontent to those skilled men who are drafted and assigned to tasks which do not utilize their capabilities. This is also a waste of the trained men who could be useful to the community in other activity or who might volunteer for more highly skilled work for a sustained period of time if offered better pay by the services. Impressed labor has not always turned out to be cheapest in the long run.

You may also ask: We tried in 1948 to get 2 million men on a voluntary basis and could not—how can we now hope to get 2½ million voluntarily? At that time, there were no programs of incentives to attract and retain manpower. Even so, reenlistments were 65 percent then—presumably because the choice of entering the service in the first place was purely voluntary, and not motivated at least in part by desire to avoid the draft, as now it is—and are only 8 percent now. The drop is presumably due to the fact that many enlist to avoid the draft, and are therefore anxious to serve as briefly as possible. So the draft has actually been accompanied by a decrease in the reenlistment rate. This adds to the amount of training which is wasted on men who leave the service before they have served long enough to justify the amounts spent to train them.

Let us accept the draft as necessary at this time, but I think it is of paramount importance to know what the draft is and what its weaknesses are. I believe that there is enough weakness to show that the draft should be continued for only 2 years while some committee of Congress studies the military system and its manpower procurement policies. This is the only way we will discharge our obligation to ourselves and the American people—this is the only way that we may feel secure in the space age.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLF. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. KILDAY. I would like to have the gentleman repeat the percentage of enlistments that he just mentioned. I believe he said something in the neighborhood of 8 percent.

Mr. WOLF. In the services other than the Army, the reenlistment rate in 1957 was about 8 percent; approximately.

Mr. KILDAY. In 1957, in the services other than the Army?

Mr. WOLF. According to the figures I was given by the Library of Congress.

Mr. KILDAY. May I ask the gentleman the source of the figure?

Mr. WOLF. The Library of Congress.

Mr. KILDAY. Has the gentleman consulted the hearings as to what percentage is given?

Mr. WOLF. I did, and I was surprised that there was quite a difference, and I hope somebody will clear this difference up for my benefit.

Mr. KILDAY. So you are citing the figures that you received from the Library of Congress?

Mr. WOLF. And the figures from the Library of Congress were based on military figures that they received from the military department.

Mr. KILDAY. Of course, on page 38 of the hearings will be found the various percentages by services and by the Department of Defense as a whole for 1957, 1958, and 4 months of 1959.

Mr. WOLF. There seems to be some dispute about those figures. I think there is room for reasonable dispute.

Mr. KILDAY. As to the figures of the Department of Defense, the gentleman feels that there is room for doubting these figures that were given to the committee?

Mr. WOLF. I think that is correct. However, I shall be happy to recheck the figures and discuss it further later today.

Mr. KILDAY. That is all.

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may require.

Mr. Chairman, I want to call to the attention of the gentleman from Iowa who preceded me that those who advocate a 2-year extension of the draft rather than a 4-year extension seem to indicate that the Congress would be helpless to stop inductions in less than 4 years if we grant a 4-year extension of the draft.

Quite the contrary is true. We can stop inductions at any time sooner than 4 years that the Congress desires—either by repeal of the authority to draft or denial of funds to pay draftees.

But, the best military judgment available in America today has informed the House Committee on Armed Services, which is headed by the very distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON], that we have a military requirement to extend the draft for 4 years. In the first instance, this is for the defense of America, and I, for one, shall accept the judgment of our military leaders, whose devotion to our Nation is no less than our own. And I shall accept the judgment of our distinguished and able chairman [Mr. VINSON], whose years of experience eminently qualify him to make such a recommendation as he has made to us here today—that this legislation be extended for a period of 4 years.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and three Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with interest to the discussion by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Armed Services. I heard him say in the course of his remarks that there could be no argument against the logic which his testimony before this House contained. It was essentially the same testimony with which he opened the hearings and essentially the same testimony which we find in the report.

I learned years ago, Mr. Chairman, that one should rarely quarrel with the logic of one's adversary. Usually the gentleman is learned and his logic is impeccable, and I do not quarrel with the logic. I found instead that typically if one wishes to make a case, one must first examine the premises upon which the argument proceeds. So if I may use my time today to do so, I should like to examine the premises upon which this controversy, in my opinion, appears to be based, I think our arguments will be found to lie at the heart of the premises upon which the two cases, for a 4-year extension and against it, rest.

We can agree, certainly, on the first premise, that we all share an obligation, having taken the oath of office, to provide for the common defense. I am glad that it has been granted here in advance, that this will not be an issue in this debate, that we can agree with that first premise.

We have been given the premise that the draft is the way by which we will secure the strength of the United States and preserve, apparently, the United Nations as well. It is evident from the argument which is made by my distinguished colleague from Iowa that there are those who would argue that the draft is not the way by which we can best secure that strength, for many reasons which he cited.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to read parts of a carbon copy I have received of a letter addressed to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Armed Services from one William Robert Miller. He says that he was mustered out as a disabled veteran in 1947, after serving with the Far Eastern Air Force in the Philippines. Also, he says, the tradition of volunteering in his family goes back at least to the Civil War and probably to the Revolutionary War.

Then he says:

> I am convinced that conscription results in a waste of manpower and money. I am not an expert and have conducted no surveys, but I believe from my experience that from a thoroughly military standpoint alone it could be shown that it is extremely wasteful to build a nation's defenses around men whose first and paramount thought about military service is how to get out of it.
> If a man is induced to do a job, he'll work well at it. But we all know how costly forced labor is, and all the patriotic appeals in the world will not put forced labor on a par with the work of freemen. During World War II this fact was borne out in my own experience time and again in the griping and goldbricking and general malingering of the draftees I saw. I doubt that "goofing off" would be a feature of a regular army of volunteers.
> And how is it with officers who have to assign men to various jobs? When they are dealing with draftees, it doesn't seem to make much difference whether the right man goes into the right place. In my time, it seemed to be "standard operational procedure" to put a man in the place where he least wanted to go and was least qualified to be. It is a wonder to me that the United States won the war.

I can say, having worked here in the Executive Office of the President at the time, that sometimes I wondered myself.

> To cite only one example from my own case, I was interested in and qualified for radio training, but I was sent to airplane and engine mechanics school and given 6 months of training which turned out to be utterly useless. Anyone on the flight line would have had to be out of his mind to assign me to work on an airplane as a mechanic.
> When I failed one course in A and E school, my CO called me in and threatened to send me overseas as a rifleman in an airdrome security outfit. I agreed readily, because I wanted to get overseas. But he was only bluffing, and I was sent back to school and pushed through with barely passing grades.
> As I have said, this is only one episode among many. I don't believe these things would be possible if the Army were forced to plan carefully and use its manpower efficiently, the way a civilian employer has to do. And if the Army (and the other service branches, too) had to attract men, they would get the right kind of men.
> It would be an improvement if this were done on any terms, but it would probably also turn out to be cheaper to maintain a smaller contingent of well-paid, well-trained men with the kind of morale that can be developed only among volunteers, than it is to subsidize the monumental goldbricking society which an army of draftees inevitably tends to be. A lot of people think the draft is regrettable but necessary. I think it is basically un-American, and the facts would show that you can't defend liberty with an army that is not a product of the American way of free choice. If it could be done, that might be regrettable.

Well, this comment by my friend, Mr. Miller, simply dramatizes the point I would like to make. There is a sharp difference among us as to how to secure that strength. Certainly, if young men are not motivated adequately now, they will not be adequately motivated simply by the fact that you are changing the date of that law to 1963 from 1959. Better pay for recruits, a better program to hold reservists, wider use of civilians for support type of activity for transportation, housing and food, as well as wider use of local support overseas—this is the kind of thing that might make for more efficient use of manpower and might get greater strength with smaller numbers.

Then, also there is a difference among us as to the question of the assumption that you cannot secure an adequate force, regardless of the exact numbers thereof, without the draft. The distinguished chairman cites the experience in 1948 and in the report and in his opening remarks quoted from President Truman's message. I will call the attention of the House to the fact that in the year 1948, in March of 1948 when these observations were made, we were before the Czechoslovakian coup d'etat—we were speaking before the experience of the Berlin blockade and the Korean incident. The cold war, frankly, was not yet really on.

Yet, it seems to me it is a mistake to assume that the events of the past decade will have no influence on the opinions of young men and young women in this country. It is a similar mistake to assume that it has not any influence on our own opinion. Having lived through the war experience, we had such an attitude before 1948. You will recall that the President's military budget for 1947, with congressional support, was a $15 billion budget and not a $45 billion or $46 billion budget as now. The assumption, therefore, that the 1948 experience is necessarily definitive for today, it seems to me, ignores a great deal of history that has taken place in the interim. It also ignores the change in the size of the labor force between that time and today. We were then getting the depression babies coming of age. We are now getting the war babies coming of age, and there is a larger manpower pool.

But, my fundamental concern turns to the philosophy and psychology of our entire situation. As Americans, it seems to me we have a far more profound obligation than to worry about whether or not the military can change its personnel policies and get enough men—or must we give them this to secure draftees. Our fundamental concern must be—which way to peace? How shall America best be assured that the awesome weapons of mutual destruction which we have created need never be used? I, for one, should like to think that our energies would be devoted to following those paths which would demonstrate to the world that we do not seek another war—and that we do not seek any war but one war: the war that we should be seeking is the war against man's ancient enemies—disease, hunger, misery, and poverty. This is the only war in which all mankind can be victorious.

It seems to me we should be giving our attention, Mr. Chairman, to making the appeal to the young people and to the citizens everywhere, both at home and abroad, to devote the larger part of our energies, not to training men to man missiles of mass destruction, but rather to training young men as technical missionaries with slide rules, with medical kits, to fight communism on a positive basis and not to use guns and flame throwers to fight communism, but to go out into the world as missionaries of peace.

It seems to me that the younger generation today, as ever, are imaginative. They will respond creatively to a constructive alternative, but they are now depressed by the thought that the only hope for us is that we shall have a larger number of intercontinental ballistic missiles with which to rain down death and destruction upon the women and children and soldiers throughout the world.

It seems to me that we must examine very closely the basic proposition by which we are to be governed. For too long this Nation has been governed by its fears. I believe we all share the view that we are not really likely to face a new world war. We all know that no such war could be won. The only question would be, Shall the destruction of both our Nation and our enemies be consummated in 3 days or in 30 days? That essentially is the difference.

I think we should ask the military force to live without the draft. If we must have it, this Congress can be called into session and pass an extension of the draft in a very short time. But think of the psychological effect both at home and abroad, if we would turn our face toward peace, if we would devote our energies to that course of action which will build a more peaceful world. We must learn to live together or we shall surely die together.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON] has expired.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MEYER].

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Chairman, the continuance of military conscription at this time is neither necessary nor desirable.

I have studied this issue thoroughly, and years of study and reflection have added to my conviction. As a result of my speaking publicly against this measure, I received letters from many people scattered across this land. Almost all of them urge me to speak for them in this House, and I believe that they represent the thinking of millions of Americans.

I have, in a few weeks, learned to love this citadel of liberty, but even more I love my country and its cherished traditions. I respect the leaders of this body and sincerely believe that my colleagues advocate what they consider right and proper. My love for my country and my convictions as to its best interests force me to differ with some of them on this issue. I know that they will respect my right to speak the truth as I see it, with all the force and directness available to me just as I will respect their rights.

I wish that I did not have to conclude that a cancerous militarism is growing in this country. It poses a threat to most of our institutions and creates an unevaluated inner peril. If this House continues to permit military leaders and their spokesmen to usurp the powers and duties of Congress, then Patrick Henry spoke in vain. All of us honor the officers and men who lead or maintain our defenses, but we should not permit them to unduly interfere in the formation of national policy or legislation. Washington recognized the danger, and Jefferson advocated a free civilian government. If we allow a modern Praetorian Guard to incubate as a menace to a modern Rome, we will have chosen Sparta at its worst in preference to Athens at its best. Must we imitate Germany because Russia has become a neighbor and competitor? Must we burn our house because we hear a wolf howl at our door? The answer is a ringing, everlasting no.

This great land of ours can find a positive way to peace. We can maintain an adequate military defense without crucifying our traditions and ideals on a double-edged sword. Make no mistake, the military state is such a sword. It may protect us from invasion, but it can lead to self-destruction or to dangerous adventuring. We have the moral force and the spiritual resources to forge an international system of law and order. We have the people and the economic strength to lead the world to justice and understanding. The way to positive solutions may be difficult, but who wants the easy path that leads to nowhere or to worse? I have no time or use for appeasement, but as long as I have access to this floor, I will fight for reason and for truth. I will not admit that the spirit of the men who followed William Penn to these shores is dead.

Why should we speed this bill to the Senate? I appeal to your sense of responsibility. We are no rubber stamp. Why should we relegate debate to the Senate? If this is the most important bill coming before the Armed Services Committee, then I say that this House should combine duty and pride so as to be of service to the public in thoroughly evaluating it. What is the reason for rushing it through? Why were we not furnished the record of the hearings in time to weigh the pros and cons? Why should this House and the American people not be granted adequate time to fully consider and deliberate? Are we children for whom father knows best? The generals have spoken—let the American people have a chance to raise their voices, too. Perhaps I am living in a never, never land in which the voiceless masses of free Americans defer to a few admirals. I doubt it. I hope that I am not, because I do not know how such a country could be defended.

Here are 10 of the many reasons for not extending the draft:

First. We can have better defense with volunteer, career professional forces. The need is for quality rather than for quantity.

Second. Well-paid forces provide better defense at less expense under such conditions.

Third. We have no right to conscript labor at substandard rates nor to maintain a system riddled with inequities.

Fourth. The Pentagon itself knows that the system is wrong.

Fifth. The Pentagon and others push this bill only because they are afraid to try to change it. They will not make the effort unless forced to do so, and they fear discussion, because they know that the entire issue is explosive and riddled with legitimate grounds for objections.

Sixth. It interferes with the proper development of our youthful manpower.

Seventh. It weakens the total strength of our country which must include science, industry, agriculture, and other fields, as well as the military.

Eighth. It is wasteful in every way.

Ninth. It lulls us into a false sense of security and hinders the mobilizing of moral and spiritual forces while inculcating militaristic doctrine.

Tenth. It violates our traditions and conflicts with much of our moral and religious thinking. This does not contribute to our international standing or to peaceful solutions of world problems.

A full case against conscription cannot be developed in a few minutes when the issue merits many hours of study. However, I can alert you to the dangers of passing such a bill—particularly under forced pressure. This calls dramatic attention to the even greater dangers in militarism that threaten our way of life.

This is much more than the voting on an Army draft bill. American democracy is on trial. It may be later than we think in the cycles of history. I hope that this is not so, but shadows of handwriting appear upon the wall. This means that we may face in militarism an inner danger almost as great as the external dangers. We might destroy ourselves while trying to protect ourselves.

In closing, I would like to call your attention to words from the constitution of Vermont which call for frequent recurrence to fundamental principles in order to preserve the blessing of liberty and keep government free. This I urge you to consider.

Mrs. GREEN of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEYER. I yield to the gentlewoman from Oregon.

Mrs. GREEN of Oregon. Can the gentleman tell me what the position of the A.F. of L. and CIO is in regard to the 4-year extension?

Mr. MEYER. As I understand it, they would prefer the 2 years with a study commission.

Mrs. GREEN of Oregon. Could a study really be made during the 2 years so that at the end of that time we could come up with a better program with a more efficient use of manpower and a wiser expenditure of the tax dollars?

Mr. MEYER. Yes.

Mrs. GREEN of Oregon. Does the gentleman know what the position of the national chamber of commerce is?

Mr. MEYER. They are for the 2 years.

Mrs. GREEN of Oregon. They are also in favor of only a 2-year extension of the draft and recommend that a study be made of the many criticisms that have been leveled against the drafts it operates today?

Mr. MEYER. That is right, as I understand it.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VAN ZANDT].

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, good and adequate reasons for extending the induction authority to July 1, 1963, have been presented. The Nation needs the draft to insure that we keep the Armed Forces at the minimum strength.

But there are some other considerations involved. It seems to me important to recognize other reasons for extending the draft.

It has been made perfectly plain that the recruiting efforts of all the armed services are successful only to the extent that the draft boards provide the recruiters with a strong prospect.

Every boy, by the time he is 17, knows that he will register with his local board at 18. He knows that he will probably be called into service. In many cases, this is all the incentive he needs to enlist.

For boys 18 and older, the local board has every name and address. If this fact does not make the man ready to enlist, there is further processing which will bring him closer to service. Eventually he is classified. If he is in I–A, he can be pretty sure that except for failure to pass the physical, mental, or moral tests, he is going to go. He may delay it with a deferment for a time, but his call is pretty certain. These men are already more than half sold as enlistees. Then, when he has been examined by the armed services and found acceptable for induction, he has his last chance to make a choice—either enlist, or wait to be drafted.

No one will deny that the recruiting services rely heavily on this processing—and on the virtual certainty of eventual service by every qualified man—to produce enlistees. This is as it should be. It is certainly in keeping with American principles to provide every opportunity and the maximum time for a citizen to voluntarily perform a fundamental duty of citizenship. For those to whom the opportunity to choose is not important, the Selective Service System provides an extremely fair and considerate method of determining when a citizen shall perform his military duty.

It is interesting to note that hundreds of local board clerks have been honored with citations and certificates by the recruiting services. The recruiters in the field know and value the aid these clerks give them; the help they receive by the fact that the Selective Service System exists and is operational.

None of this is intended to reflect on the recruiting services. They do a fine job. But it emphasizes the vital role Selective Service plays in the manpower procurement process. No man is forced to decide when and how to fill the obligation to help defend his country. On the other hand, time and ways for everyone to make his own choice are provided.

And if every qualified man exercised that choice, there would still be no reason to assume that the draft was no longer needed. In such an event, there would be no necessity to induct men. But there would still be the need to be prepared to induct men. There would remain the need to keep compulsion in the background to induce men to make their own choice of time and place to serve.

It should be remembered also, that it isn't enough to have 500,000 men volunteer to meet the needs of the armed services for 500,000 men. Let us assume that the existence of the draft induced these half million men to volunteer. Would they volunteer in the proper proportions for the different branches of the Armed Forces? Would they volunteer in the proper proportion for the particular types of duty offered by any one armed service?

There is a tendency to misread the meaning of fluctuating draft calls. Whether a call for one month is higher or lower than the previous month has little if any bearing on the need for the draft. Nor does the trend toward smaller calls, or toward larger calls, really affect the fundamental requirement that the Nation stand ready to enforce, insofar as is necessary, the obligation of each citizen to help defend the Nation.

The role that the Selective Service System plays in our total defense structure is obscured, also, by overemphasizing the actual numbers inducted, or the effect of the draft in stimulating enlistments. We have developed in this country a unique, proven, and highly accepted method of bringing men into the service. I refer specifically to the local board system. These boards are composed of leading members of their community. They know the area and the people with whom they deal. They are required to be civilians. They exercise, subject to appeal, sole authority to classify and select men for service. Practically every community has its own board, and in larger cities, there are many boards but with jurisdiction based on geographical neighborhoods and population density.

In its area, the local board has an unequaled accumulation of data on manpower from age 18 to 35. It is not difficult to visualize the value of this grassroots organization, and the information it possesses, in the event of a nuclear attack. The distinct portions of the Selective Service System, including separate local boards, are capable of operating in isolation should the need arise. They are able to furnish manpower data to any authorized emergency user. And the boards have taken measures to preserve duplicate vital records in vulnerable areas. There would be retained in the event of such a disaster, a local capacity to guide manpower utilization for survival.

The local boards have a real influence on manpower utilization in other ways, too. Everyone is aware of the necessity for the fullest use of technical manpower, and the need to increase the supply of that manpower and to improve its use. By deferring students, by deferring men engaged in teaching, science, engineering, research, and other pursuits vital to the national interest, selective service has helped tremendously to ease our shortages and influence the proper use of skilled men in civilian life. Men are deferred to prepare for these callings, and are deferred to follow them. The prospects of deferment serve to hold men in those fields when better pay might otherwise lure them into more lucrative but less vital activities, from the standpoint of national strength.

Thousands of college students were deferred during the Korean war. It is fair to say, that had there not been those deferments, many of them granted under a nationwide testing program established by the System, this country would now have 50,000 to 60,000 fewer skilled engineers, scientists, and researchers than it has today.

The Korean war also is an excellent illustration of the value of a draft system in being. The Selective Service System was reestablished in June 1948. A few thousand men were inducted. Enlistments climbed spectacularly. But our forces were subsequently reduced so that for a period of nearly 18 months draft-stimulated enlistments met the needs of the reduced Armed Forces for men.

A skeleton of the Selective Service System was preserved. It was badly hampered by a reduced budget and a long period of inactivity. But the boards existed, and although consolidated wherever possible, each had some clerical help.

Despite this rundown state of the System, when the Korean war broke out we were able to deliver men within 60 days—about as fast as it is possible to do so. If the System had been disbanded, the period would have been more like several months—a timelag which in Korea might have meant disaster.

There is more at stake than putting men into the Active and Reserve Forces in peacetime. Those are the prime objectives—part of the end product. They certainly make extension mandatory. But in extending this authority to induct 4 more years, we are preserving what very well may be the indispensable foundation to our capacity to strengthen our Nation and retain our capacity to survive.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VAN ZANDT. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I commend the gentleman on his statement and associate myself with his remarks. I have attended the hearings with respect to this legislation and I am satisfied in my mind that there is absolutely no alternative to extending the draft 4 years, as provided by this bill.

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Chairman, I believe that some other points should be made in the interest of a fuller understanding of all that is involved in our draft system. The need for extension of the induction authority to maintain the active forces is recognized.

It may not have been made so clear that the strength and stability of the Reserve and National Guard, air and ground, also depend on the draft.

The effect of the draft on the Guard and Reserves is much the same as it is on enlistments into the Active Forces. Men enter the Guard and Reserves in many cases because by doing so they are deferred from induction. And the man who enters a Guard or Reserve unit has every reason to remain there and to be an effective member. If he drops satisfactory training, he loses his deferment, as a minimum penalty, and then is subject in his turn to induction. In the case of some enlistments into the Reserves or National Guard, a man who fails to continue to participate satisfactorily is subject to a penalty induction out of turn and regardless of other grounds for deferment that may exist.

It should be understood that the local boards make no decisions in these latter cases. If the Guard or Reserve unit certifies a man as subject to the penalty induction provisions, then the Selective Service System simply complies with the certification. Although few men have been inducted in this way, the existence of this penalty does help to keep men in good standing in the Reserve and Guard units.

The success of the 6-month training program is by now well known. Its success is due, it may be said almost entirely due, to the fact that participation in it provides deferment from induction. Not only have the Guard and Reserves attained strength goals, but of equal importance, the state of training of these vital support forces has reached a high level. No longer must there be a constant repetition of basic training. The initial 6 months of active duty for training, and the reduction of turnover in Reserve and Guard units allow training to progress. Turnover is reduced because men remain in and participate satisfactorily in lieu of being inducted for 2 years of active duty.

Now the Reserve I have been speaking about is the Ready Reserve.

But the same considerations apply to the other elements of the Reserve components. And those elements are important to our defense posture. They represent the reservoir of men with more or less training, some still obligated to train, others volunteer reservists. They include a large number of individuals with rare and valuable skills the services would need in a mobilization. They include men who have had some military training or service.

So long as the future remains uncertain every man-day of military training in the population is valuable. And when less than all the population has training in the elements of physical survival, it is important that society make the best use of those who do have it. Therefore, these reservists—inactive as they may be—are a part of our strength. They may well be a key part of it.

The members of these second- and third-line Reserves who are not veterans are likewise not being inducted so long as they are satisfactorily members of those Reserve components. They are doing something. They are not and should not be inducted while there are men making no contribution, who are qualified and available, to man the Active Forces.

Part of this second line of reservists—the Standby Reserve—is subject to recall to active duty in time of war or national emergency declared by Congress. But in 1955, Congress provided that such men could then be recalled only after they were determined by the Director of Selective Service to be available.

There is good reason for that provision of the law, as perhaps all of us recall. In the rush to meet the challenge posed by the Korean war, the recall of reservists to active duty often resulted in hardships and inequities to individuals; penalized families and civilian activities, and not always served the purposes of the Armed Forces effectively.

It was to prevent that kind of indiscriminate recall of reservists that Congress directed the Selective Service System to evaluate each reservist to determine where he should serve. The local boards now maintain a constant processing of the records of these men. They number at present 1,500,000 and the number is growing still. A decision must be reached in every case whether the reservist shoud be available for recall, or whether in the national interest he should be left in a vital civilian job or to care for dependents. The names of those available for recall are reported to the Armed Forces.

It will be apparent that this is not a job to be done once. The man available today may be in vital research tomorrow, and vice versa. In order for the list of available reservists to have any meaning, it must be as current as it is possible to keep it. So the local boards constantly must cull through these reservists to insure a better utilization of this segment of our trained and partially trained manpower in the event of need.

We must continue to manage our potential military manpower, especially that part of it which has had some training against the day when the skills they have learned in survival may be needed.

The Selective Service System is the only agency in existence with the experience and the organization to carry out that kind of a job. And it is a job which must inevitably grow, until that time which we all fervently seek arrives—when we need not maintain a potent military organization in being; and when we need not view as urgent the necessity to train our citizens to survive in nuclear war. But that day is not foreseeable. Until it is here, we cannot risk the Nation's existence by failing to take every possible step to remain strong.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILDAY].

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, if anyone was elected to Congress under an illusion that there would not be difficult decisions to be made here or distasteful choices to be made, I feel that it is good that he is disillusioned so early in the session. This is a question which none of us approach with any great joy. Those who have dealt with this question from the beginning, in 1940, do so without any feeling of satisfaction that this must be done. However, we have found in the past, and the hearings now sustain the fact, that it is necessary that a continuance of the power to induct be made at this time.

I have no quarrel with anyone, whether in this Chamber or not, who is conscientiously opposed to military service or anything of that kind. While I disagree with his conclusion, I respect the fact that he has that conclusion, that it is his belief, and I would be among those first to defend his right to so believe, and do so with absolute respect for the opinion which he holds.

The situation is this: This is not a military nation. Very few of the American people have any desire to pursue a military career. So we have found over the years, and we have found since 1940, that in order to maintain an adequate military force we must attract and hold practically all of those Americans who have a desire to pursue a military career and who at the same time possess the aptitude for a military career.

We have found in the past as we know now that we cannot maintain what is now regarded as the minimum force necessary without compulsion with respect to the entrance of young men into the service. Now in what situation is the Congress on this subject? Last year when the appropriation bill for the Department of Defense was here, this Congress appropriated funds for 30,000 more members of the Army than had been requested by the President and the Department of Defense. Additional sums for the regular components of the Army and Marine Corps were provided and we expressed the sense of the Congress that those were the minimum numbers required for the safety of the United States during fiscal year 1959. We provided a figure and the funds necessary to pay the reserve components in excess of the number requested by the President and the administration. In that instance we went even further. We used language which on its face is mandatory—that the reserve components shall be maintained at the higher figure. That was the attitude of this Congress, about the middle of last year when the appropriation bill came here. So that we are positively on record for maintaining that type of force.

During the hearings and here on the floor, there has been some mention made of the question of pay and forced labor in order to get men for less than the current pay. Mention was made of the Cordiner report. As the chairman of the subcommittee which considered that report and wrote the pay bill, I regard myself as being one of the very few people in the United States outside of the Cordiner Committee itself who ever read the complete Cordiner Committee report. We considered that report and the minimums suggested by the Cordiner report is what we adopted. Complaint is made as to the disparity between the increases in the top ratings. There we cut down very materially on what the Cordiner Committee had recommended. But any idea that a recruit or private in the service is secured at a reduced wage is a complete fallacy. I know of nothing which is used by the Government of the United States which costs more than the private soldier. True, he enters at $78 per month. I would like to know where there is another young man in the age bracket who has room and board, clothes, medical and dental care and everything else that goes into making a living and yet has $78 or $87 or $90 a month left after he has paid off these charges against him. The only thing in the world that that man has to buy when he is in the service is his toothpaste, shaving cream, blades and his laundry and haircuts. That is all in the world that he is required to pay out of the money that he gets. In addition to that, his dependents are taken care of under the Dependents Assistance Act which is continued by the provisions of this bill. His dependents have the right to medical care either in Government hospitals or in private hospitals with the Government picking up the check for everything except the first $25 in private hospitals. Whenever anyone attempts to bring forth any question that these young men are acquired at a cut rate for labor or that he is not costing you lots of money, I hope proper reflection will be made and that these other items will be taken into consideration in that regard.

Mention has been made as to General Maddux who worked with our committee on the pay question and again with reference to the Cordiner Committee report. Of course, what those gentlemen were talking about were the highly skilled and trained technicians. They were urging a pay scale for proficiency in a speciality, a type of pay which was being brought back for the first time in a very long time. Back about 1940 or 1942 we had specialist pay where a man could be a private, but in addition to that pay he would also draw specialist pay as a saddlemaker, a horse shoer, a musician, and things of that kind. But this was a new departure for proficiency. The Congress established a proficiency pay system. It does not apply only to technicians, of course, because all of these people in the military service are auxiliary to the fighting men. Their responsibility in the service is to keep that fighter on the front, in the planes, in the submarines, and on the carriers. Everything else is auxiliary to keeping that man on the front. The highest efficiency you could have would be that required in combat. There have been many types of figures and percentages used here. I would not attempt to go into all of them, because frankly I do not remember all the things that go into them. But if you will turn to page 38 of the hearings—and I assure you that these figures are reliable—you will find the figures that come from official sources.

While I do not always like the attitude of the executive departments toward the Congress, I will have to say that in a period of 20 years here I have not known them to give us deliberately false statistics on a matter of this kind. These are reliable figures and can be accepted exactly as you find them in this report. It is very revealing, because it is divided as to all regulars. First, term regulars and then career regulars. Let's look at the career regular, the fellow who reenlists for his second term. Where are we with him? In the entire Department of Defense during the first 4 months of fiscal 1959 we were reenlisting 87.9 percent of them. In the Army it was 86.2 percent; in the Navy 90.4 percent; the Marine Corps, 76.8 percent; the Air Force, 91 percent. Those are the people who are military career minded and oriented. These are the people from whom you will be able at all times and under all circumstances to draw your military force, provided you pay them adequately and give them the other benefits which must go with a military career. We are attracting 87.9 percent of the whole, but that leaves us approximately 250,000 people who at all times are serving as inductees in the Army. The idea that because the Air Force, the Navy, and the Marines are so attractive that they do not have to induct men can hardly be sustained. I do not believe you could say a boy chose the Marine Corps because he would not have an opportunity to fight. He wants to choose his own branch. The same is true of the Navy and of the Air Force. But what do we find among inductees? These boys have been reenlisting at a rate of 2.7 percent in 1955; 4 percent in 1958; and 5 percent at present. So we are consistently improving. But, from those who are not career minded or career motivated, we must supplement the number on active duty by the compulsion of the draft and the induction of individuals. Of course, complaint has been made in the hearings before the committee that it is discriminatory; that it is not universal. The law says it is "the Universal Training and Service Act." I would be the last to contend that this is not discriminatory to a degree, and perhaps to a substantial degree, but it is always going to be discriminatory until such time as the Congress of the United States, sustained by the American people, is willing to go into an all-out universal training program in the United States. When you do that, then there will be no discrimination, and the burden will fall equally on all.

I have bloodied my head many times in trying to pass a universal training act. Thus far the people are not going to sustain it, as reflected by the Members of Congress. As long as you do not have that program there is going to be an element of discrimination.

I agree thoroughly with those who say that the proper way to maintain peace is to follow the dictates of religion and charity. I do not believe there are many people in the United States you are going to have to convince that that is the proper way to do it. My trouble has always been that we have made no headway with the Russians in getting them to sincerely agree to that, believe in it and agree to follow it. Until such time as they do I think the vast majority of us must confess the fact that we must maintain the adequate military force which is provided in present law.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I have no quarrel with what the gentleman says about the number of men needed in the armed services and I am not one of those who think that you can have a few men and get by just because you have a lot of new weapons; nor do I believe that the country that uses equipment that costs the most will necessarily win the war. Many of us remember that in the early days of World War II there were those who said that whoever had the most poison gas would win the war in a few days and that there was no need for a large ground force. We carried those gas masks all during World War II and never did use them. Each side was afraid to use the gas for the fear the other side would retaliate. What has happened in the past will probably happen again. What has actually happened in the past is that the nation that had the greatest number of ground forces could cover the ground while they were being delivered supplies by sea and being protected by the air and that is what won the war. I assume that the same thing may happen again.

I listened to the gentleman's reference to the figures in his report on page 38. I am interested also in the figures on page 32 which show a very low percentage of reservists. I think we are all aware of the tremendous assets of the Reserves, and those of us who were first baptized into what you might call the mores of the military in the early days of World War II know the extremely important part that the Reserves played. As a matter of fact, everywhere we looked the Reserves were doing the work, and so many of what one might call the West Point professional goldbrick golfers took almost a year to get the rust out of their joints. That is just about the situation that existed at that time. The Reserves are a terrific militant force, and they earn incomes and on an average pay more than enough income taxes to more than pay for their own cost of training, and in that way they sustain themselves.

My question to the gentleman from Texas is, Why is it that we do not have more Reserves and especially Ready Reserves instead of having to turn to these 2-year inductees?

Mr. KILDAY. There are a number of questions involved in the gentleman's one question. For a very long period of time the inductee going out of the service was not required to perform Active Reserve service. There was a hiatus in the law under which there was no power in the Military Department to assign the man with a Reserve obligation to a Reserve unit. That situation is being corrected now where we take men in for a 6-month training period and they then go into the Reserves or the National Guard. And the 2-year inductee has a Reserve obligation which must be discharged in a Reserve component unit. So the Reserves are going to be built up more in the future.

Of course, the number that you can retain in pay status is going to depend upon the amount of money appropriated by Congress for that purpose.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Is the military department willing to cooperate in maintaining a large Ready Reserve force to take the place of some of these inductees? Or is there something that could be done other than merely extending the same law for another 4 years?

Mr. KILDAY. I mentioned as part of the Reserve problem a minute ago that Congress requires the maintenance of a larger Reserve force than was requested by the President and the Department of Defense. That will remain the law until June 30, 1959, unless a similar provision or the identical provision is placed in the appropriations for 1960. That floor will not be under the Reserve components after July 1, 1959; and it is the intention of the Department of Defense to go ahead with that reduction. That is contrary to what Congress feels as expressed in the appropriation bill; and the mandatory language used in that bill.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Then is it fair to state, may I ask the gentleman: Those of us who feel that there should be more Ready Reserves to take the place of some of these 2-year inductees, the thing to do is when the appropriations come up to be working at that time for a larger appropriation?

Mr. KILDAY. That is about what you are going to have to decide, if you are going to decide to use ready reservists, completely in lieu of men on active duty, but your active duty force is going to have to always and inevitably be your first line of defense. Reserve components come afterward.

Our Ready Reserve is quite considerable, 2,443,047 as of November 30, 1958. This is as of November 30, 1958. In the National Guard it is 434,274, the Army Reserve 998,477, Naval Reserve 543,588, Marine Corps 216,161, Air National Guard 70,377, Air Force Reserve 182,107. In addition to that you have the Standby Reserve, a total of over a million and a half. Then you have, of course, the retired Reserves which I do not believe should be taken into this calculation, although it is continued in the Army National Guard figure.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It is my understanding that there are a number of 2-year inductees that were taking basic training. They told me that after the basic training, they were shifted to some camp, and mostly for the balance of the 2 years they looked at the side of barracks and learned how to goldbrick. Why are the boys not sent home so that they, while keeping abreast of the changes during the weekly training periods, can get a job, support themselves, and pursue their civil status?

Mr. KILDAY. I do not know how it is operating in Iowa, how these boys were handled while they are in for 2 years. The fellows from Texas I see do a pretty fair 2 years of service and they carry out their Reserve obligations after they return from 6 months or 2 years of service. That is my experience with that. I think there is one thing involved in the gentleman's thinking that perhaps should be mentioned and that is the attitude of the administration at this time. They think it is safe to reduce our Reserve component strength at the same time they are reducing the Regular component strength. That is a proposition with which I personally do not agree, and I do not believe a majority of the Committee on Armed Services agrees to that. It is quite evident that the majority of both Houses of Congress do not agree to that. That was because of language placed in the appropriation bill last year. But that is the stated policy of the administration at this time, that they will reduce the Reserve components while reducing the Regular components. That is contrary to the things that this committee has said here and that we have sold to the Congress over a period of years.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. One last question. We have long since given up hope of getting anything with our leadership in the White House. The point is if they will not take the leadership on this, is there anything that the Congress can do?

Mr. KILDAY. I am not going to blast the White House today because we are on the same side. We are doing all right as of today. We will take that up when we get to another subject.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. The gentleman is aware that the Reserve officers met here only very recently, in the past 6 months. I have never had so many complaints from Reserve officer organizations or from Reserve officers complaining of the lack of programs. What has happened to our Reserve program? Do we actually have a Reserve, except on paper?

Mr. KILDAY. I think we have the best Reserve components now that we have had within my experience. We certainly have a very fine National Guard with six divisions anticipated to be ready for very prompt service.

Mr. GROSS. I am speaking of the Reserves.

Mr. KILDAY. I was coming to that. We have the Reserve organizations. Some of them are excellent. The Air Force Reserve I am acquainted with is fine. They have their planes that they fly regularly. A good many of them are troop carriers. They are ready to take off at any time.

Mr. GROSS. The Air Force Reserves is one of the Reserve organizations in my district that is complaining the most that they do not have proper training courses.

Mr. KILDAY. I do not know what has happened in Iowa. The gentleman complains about his State. If that is the experience in Iowa I do not believe it is in accordance with the majority of the experience in the United States.

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. MEYER. Did I understand the gentleman to say that in some measure he believes the privates in our Armed Forces could not earn more elsewhere, and they are getting all they are worth? It is my understanding that many of these young men could make much more than that. I would like to say that farming is generally considered a low-paid occupation, and I know of young men that would compare with privates that make as much as $40 a week and their room and board to help on farms.

Mr. KILDAY. These young men also receive medical care and 30 days leave and medical care for their families?

Mr. MEYER. No; I did not say that. Did I understand the gentleman to say that privates were only getting what they were worth?

Mr. KILDAY. No; but I will say to the gentleman, if he had been here as long as I have, he would not let anybody run him into a hole like that. What I was saying here was—and I mean it absolutely—that when you start talking about substandard pay and forced labor for far less than the going wage, you must take into consideration that $78 is the least that anybody in the military service gets, and that in addition to that he gets everything that goes into his living except his toilet articles, his haircuts, and his laundry, and that must be taken into consideration along with all of these other benefits.

Mr. MEYER. I understand that.

Mr. KILDAY. As to what a boy can do in the service, I will go further than that. I know of nothing that the average high school boy can do in the United States—I am not talking about the man going to college; I am not talking about the man going into a family business or who has a lot of investments to see him through the rest of his life; I am talking about the young man out of high school. Usually he is going to work in a bank or in a business or a factory or anywhere else. But, there is nothing in the world that he can do that will guarantee him the future that enlisting as a recruit in any of the military services will guarantee him, and guarantee him the right to retire after 20 years of service, when he is only about 38 if he goes in directly out of high school, at one-half of his pay, and if he behaves himself and works hard in the military service, as he would have to do in any private employment, he will have advanced to a position in the military establishment where he will be well and adequately taken care of after 20 years and his dependents taken care of thereafter; and if he goes for 30 years, when he is only 48 years of age, he will come out with 75 percent of his base pay. And if he has worked the way it is anticipated and hoped that he will, he will go out with a trade, as a trained worker; and he still has quite a little time to work before he starts drawing his social security. And, among the benefits I failed to mention awhile ago is that now these military people are also full participants in the social security program in addition to all of their privileges and benefits as to retirement and what-not in the military services. They were granted both, without a deduction of their retired pay. They are the only public employees in the United States who have the full privilege of noncontributory retired pay and of social security, too.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. PORTER. If the program is so attractive, then why has it not been sold, in which case there would be enough volunteers?

Mr. KILDAY. One reason is that too many men in this House get up every day and say there is nothing available for the military serviceman. That is one of the reasons. And, another reason is that there are some people in high places in the Military Establishment who, as soon as we pass one benefit, start seeking another benefit.

Mr. PORTER. I do not understand the gentleman. Does he mean that if we changed our statements here they would not try to get more benefits?

Mr. KILDAY. I know the gentleman is attempting to run me into another hole.

Mr. PORTER. I hope not.

Mr. KILDAY. I have told the gentleman where I stand on it, and that is the situation as it exists. Is the gentleman going to vote to extend the draft?

Mr. PORTER. I doubt it.

Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. KILDAY. Yes.

Mr. PORTER. I do really want to understand the gentleman's point about what this House should do differently so that volunteers would fill our ranks instead of conscripts. I would appreciate the gentleman's answering the question directly.

Mr. KILDAY. I will attempt to answer the gentleman directly.

What the gentleman was asking me was one of those old "Have you quit beating your wife" questions. If the gentleman takes the position, if it is so attractive why do not more people enlist, I answered him that one reason, and I assure the gentleman it is a very substantial reason, is because some people in the Congress of the United States, who are not conversant with the benefits made available to members of the Military Establishment, continue to make speeches to the effect that we pay them practically nothing, that we use the draft to secure forced labor, and things of that kind. That goes out to the young men of the country. They do not know any more about the facts than the gentlemen who make those statements, so they believe it.

Mr. PORTER. I have never heard such a speech in the brief time I have been a Member of this House.

Mr. KILDAY. Has the gentleman listened to himself on occasion?

Mr. PORTER. I have never made such a statement. If the gentleman would point it out to me, I would be glad to have him do so.

Mr. KILDAY. I yield no further to the gentleman.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FULTON. I want to compliment the gentleman on his stand because, of course, we have the draft for the protection of our country. Also, we ought to remember that the majority of servicemen are not drafted, they are volunteers. They might have the feeling they might be, but at least they go into the service voluntarily. I think it ought to be a career service, and I agree with the gentleman on that. Many people like the service. Those in the Reserves think it is a fine group and one of the greatest organizations we could ever belong to.

Mr. KILDAY. On the face of the figures I used before, of the 900,000 we had in the Regular Army up to the beginning of fiscal 1959 only 250,000 were draftees, so 650,000 were volunteers. But the others are not military career men.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BATES].

Mr. BATES. Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the bill reported from the committee. I recognize very well, after the brilliant exposition by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON], precise and yet comprehensive, that there is little that could be said that would not be redundant, but I do believe we should emphasize some of the things which he called to our attention.

Constantly interwoven into the fabric of our people, from the inception of the country even until today, is the abundantly clear picture that our people are not military minded. Many escaped from the Continent in the hope of being free of the militarism of Europe.

While there is a justifiable pride in the uniforms of the armed services and a willingness to serve when the threat to our security appears imminent, yet in the normal course of events, Americans are predominantly civilians at heart. It is good that this is so. Still in a cold war which presents dangers that are real, if not imminent, the military posture of defense cannot be attained without a draft at the force levels considered necessary to our security.

In an ardent and natural desire to eliminate the draft, it has been suggested that a more attractive service could be composed of entirely professional men and women. For many years, the Armed Services Committee has dedicated itself to improving the services as a career and much beneficial legislation toward that end has been enacted.

Family housing has been augmented to a great degree, commissaries and post exchanges have been improved, reenlistment bonuses have been increased, incentive pay has been added, survivors' benefits have been enlarged, retired pay will soon cost a billion dollars a year, and the Contingency Option Act permits servicemen to leave annuities for their families in the event of death after retirement. There are other meritorious programs and all have had a considerable effect upon those who would consider the service as a career. However, the gap between those who would serve voluntarily and the number required by the Department of Defense is still a wide one. While estimates vary, a reasonable judgment would reflect a shortage of approximately a million men if the draft was to be terminated.

While the draft has been universal in its title, it never has been in fact. While universality implies a degree of fairness that a selective service program does not suggest, it is not realistic and creates more problems and inefficiencies than the program currently in effect. Last year, the Congress established new ground rules and tightened the standards for inductees. Since that time, the services have increased in efficiency, added to their combat effectiveness, and in the case of the Army, three out of its five detention barracks have been closed.

Under present procedures today, 7 out of 10 of the young men reaching the age of 26 have entered the service and 9 out of the qualified men have been called to active duty.

While it would be appealing to most of us to extend the draft for a period of less than 4 years, I would suggest that there is nothing on the horizon which encourages us toward the belief that the dangers and tensions are liable to be lessened during that period. Nevertheless, it is incumbent upon our committee to review this matter constantly and take any action in the interim that circumstances dictate.

The last two extensions of the draft have been for a similar period. Let us face the facts grimly and tell the world that we shall remain strong until there is better assurance that we can live in a peaceful and honorable world without the need of military strength to assure that great goal which we all seek.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentlewoman from New York [Mrs. ST. GEORGE].

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Chairman, it would certainly be superfluous for me to add anything to what has been said on this bill. The bill has been eloquently, clearly, and intelligently discussed by the chairman of our committee, by the ranking member, and by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILDAY], and others. These people have labored long in this field—far longer than I have. They have forgotten more about it than I will ever know. But I would like to say something on this very subject. All those who came before us from the Department of Defense testified in favor of this piece of legislation. There were no ifs ands, or buts. They told us very frankly that we needed the extension—the 4-year extension—of the draft for the safeguarding of our country, first, and also for the preservation of freedom in the world.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me we must remember one thing in these days, and that is that military science is the field of experts. It is abundantly clear to me from what I have heard on this floor today that many people speak about these things more with their hearts than with their heads. While this has been an extremely laudable thing, and we are all trying for the same goal, it is not a valuable contribution. We have to listen to experts in defense. We have to listen to our leaders, military, naval, Air Force, members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and others who have this problem in their life every day, men who know what we are up against. It is impossible for everyone in the United States to understand the formidable adversary that we have and what it may mean to our country. For this reason, Mr. Chairman, I hope this House will heed the warnings of those people, who want peace just as much as anybody wants peace, and finally, Mr. Chairman, to paraphrase an old expression, only the strong deserve peace. We cannot be strong without the passage of this draft act. Many of us deplore it. I deplore it. It was my hope that the age be lowered. I do not like to see our young men kept on the string so long, until the age of 35. But I bow to the knowledge of those who have studied this question and who also want our young men to have all the freedom that they can possibly have for a brilliant and prosperous future. But how can they have that brilliant and prosperous future unless they and we keep our country strong, even if it is at some sacrifice. I believe that our people, by and large, want us to keep this country strong, so that we can insure a lasting and just peace.

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. MEYER. I would like to say that perhaps the testimony of some of the personnel of our Armed Forces has not been heard. In personal conversation with one of our highest ranking generals, he said he did not favor the draft.

I have a letter, dated Washington, Kans., January 13, which refers back quite a few years to Adm. Hillen Koetter and, if you will bear with me, it says:

> If he would have spoken out publicly he would have gotten the ax one way or the other.

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. May I say to the gentleman that, after all, I can only quote the testimony in the hearings. If people write letters in which they say "if they had spoken out publicly," I cannot know what is in the back of their minds. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlewoman from New York [Mrs. ST. GEORGE] has expired.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BECKER].

Mr. BECKER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILDAY] opened his remarks by saying that if anyone was elected to the House of Representatives under the illusion that all he was going to have was a happy time and not have to look forward to the day when he had to vote on unpleasant things, now is the time he would find one of the unpleasant things facing him and facing all of us. I want to agree with all that has been said by the chairman of this committee, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON]. In my time on that committee I have developed not only a great respect for him, but a great admiration for the time and the knowledge, the capability with which he handles all problems that come before the Committee on Armed Services. I pay my compliment to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILDAY] for his knowledge and his ability and for the presentation he has made before us.

I just want to say, of course, there are opponents to drafting our men into the service, but most of us have served in the military in one war or another and served on the battlefields of the wars.

Our sons, too, have served in the military service and served in the wars of this country, particularly in World War II and in Korea.

Today there is no doubt in the mind of anyone that with the cold war so prevalent that we must maintain our forces at a strength that will be the greatest deterrent to any potential aggressor. But one thing comes to mind and is very clear today, and that is why I take the floor.

You know when the war was on, and particularly World War II, I remember how everyone bowed to our military leaders in the field, and on every proposition that would come before Congress how readily they adhered to and how willingly listened to the advice given to us by our military men. We felt they were leaders of great experience and that when our sons went into battle they would go under competent leaders. So we followed their advice very willingly because the bands were playing, flags were flying, and the guns were rumbling in our ears; so we listened to them. But is it not strange that when the fighting stopped we did not hear the bands any longer or the rumbling of the guns and we begin to tell our military leaders how they should run their affairs.

I do not subscribe to that. Surely they can make mistakes in judgment. So do we here in this House.

But just think of it. In the hearings we have had before our committee the top civilian minds on defense, the top military minds on defense, testified not merely as to the need of the continuance of the draft but also the fact that we need it for necessary planning for a period of 4 years. All of us listened day after day to the testimony, and I assure you that with the questioning that took place I could not even remotely doubt the sincerity of these people who believe in the program for this and other reasons which the military stated.

And I say to you that this is a very unpleasant task for me to vote again that my neighbor's son must be drafted into the military service. But I also recognize that I have a responsibility assumed when the Speaker administered the oath of office to me every 2 years, a responsibility to my Nation. I shall maintain that responsibility, and I am sure the great majority of the Members of this House will assume their full responsibility today and enact this legislation as presented by the great chairman of the House Committee on Armed Services.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GROSS].

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, I am still unable to understand what is sacred about the figure 4, that is 4 years, why this act must be extended for 4 years. I have read the hearings and I find no logical argument for continuing the Selective Service Act for 4 years.

In my opinion, the situation we have here today is healthy in that the Armed Services Committee should come to Congress on this subject at least every 2 years. I would prefer a 1-year extension, but I am willing to compromise on 2 years. I cannot support 4 years.

In reading the hearings, on page 38, I find a statement by the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARDY], a member of the Armed Service Committee. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARDY] stated:

> The thing that I am going to be particularly interested in understanding as we proceed with this bill is, No. 1, we are increasing the enlistment rate, and No. 2, we have stepped up the voluntary enlistments, and No. 3, we are reducing the size of the Reserves, we are reducing the size of the active forces, and still we talk about having to continue with the draft program.
> Now, if we have to continue with the draft act in order to get people to voluntarily enlist, maybe that is a necessary evil. But it is a little difficult to understand why we need to continue the draft act for 4 years in the light of improvements in enlistments and reenlistments, and all of the other incentives that have been created, coupled with the fact that we are having a reduced regular service and a reduction in the Reserves—and where in the world are we going to put all these boys that are coming in under the 6-month program if we are going to continue to reduce our Reserve forces.

I read that statement by the gentleman from Virginia and then I read quite carefully the rest of the hearings, but I find no answers to the questions he raised. Perhaps there is someone on the committee who would be willing to provide some of the answers today.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSS. I am pleased to yield to my friend from Virginia, who is one of the most diligent and hard working Members of Congress.

Mr. HARDY. I am not going to try to answer the questions which I raised myself, but I do want to say to the gentleman that one of the purposes I had in mind in raising that question was that I am considerably disturbed by the attitude of the Department of Defense in reducing our standing forces below that which the Congress indicated they ought to maintain. That was the purpose I was trying to develop at that point.

Mr. GROSS. The gentleman raised other good questions. He will agree with me, I am sure, he did not get answers to some of his questions.

Mr. HARDY. I will have to agree with that. The Pentagon frequently does not give all of the answers it should.

Mr. GROSS. On page 36 of the hearings, and I would like to reiterate and reemphasize this, we have the testimony of Assistant Secretary Finucane in which he stated:

> So it seems to me that 4 years has become established by custom.

What are we asked to do today, extend conscription of American boys for 4 years to satisfy custom or are we extending the Draft Act because it is necessary?

Then I turn to page 47 and refer to the testimony in part of General Taylor:

> Finally, I would just say that in the present international climate any reduction of the time of our draft extension would suggest, I am afraid, to our allies, that perhaps we don't think the situation is particularly serious, and I think it would have serious adverse psychological impacts abroad as well as at home.

Are we being called upon to extend the Draft Act for 4 years to please foreign governments, or are we extending it for 4 years because it is necessary?

I call attention again to the table to be found in the hearings on page 50 and refer to the periods of obligated service in foreign countries and the fact that the British are contemplating eliminating their conscription program altogether in 1960.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to a 4-year extension. I hope the amendment to extend it for 2 years will be adopted, and I would prefer to support an amendment for 1 year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KOWALSKI].

Mr. KOWALSKI. Mr. Chairman, in our present circumstances, we have no alternative but to extend the military draft. The question that is being debated on the floor today and in your minds is whether we should extend the draft for 2 years or for 4 years. The more fundamental problem that we in Congress must determine in the near future is the question whether there may be a better, more effective and more efficient way of raising an army and recruiting our military forces than by means of the draft.

Can we, for example, set up such incentives that a volunteer system would provide all the men needed? Or can we depend on a standby draft or some other method yet to be determined? There are many in the services today who prefer the volunteer system.

The Commandant of the Marine Corps has proudly announced that his is a volunteer force. General LeMay, in his testimony before the Armed Services Committee, specifically, in answer to my question whether the strength of the Air Force would be affected if the draft were extended for only 1 year, replied that the strength of the Air Force would not be affected. This is significant testimony.

As some of you may know, I have recently retired from the Army after 33 years of active service. In the light of my experience, I have no hesitation in telling you that there are thousands of American soldiers performing duties completely unrelated to our security effort and contributing nothing to our capability to defend this Nation. Hundreds of men are serving as houseboys, cooks, laundry boys, maids and servants for our senior officers. Other hundreds are being used in jobs of limited military value. In the Pentagon, there are sergeants, on whose training we have spent thousands of dollars, being used as mess boys and waiters. There are a large number of senior noncommissioned officers in the Pentagon who have not worn a uniform of their service for years, but are dressed instead in the neat black suits of chaffeurs.

Very bluntly, Mr. Chairman, I do not want my son or the sons of my constituents to be drafted to serve as a laundry boy or waiter for anyone in the military services.

I am convinced that Congress has the obligation to take a hard, critical look at the utilization of enlisted men in the military services. I believe that after this hard look is taken, this Congress can literally shake out one or two divisions of troops in the Army. I think we can eliminate hundreds of jobs now being performed by enlisted men or convert many of these military billets to civilian jobs.

I am pleased that our distinguished chairman of the Armed Services Committee has established a special subcommittee to study the utilization of military manpower. I am convinced that this subcommittee will come up with recommendations for better utilization of enlisted men in the military services. I am hopeful that this subcommittee will recommend to Congress a more effective and more efficient method than the draft for recruiting the men we need to defend our Nation.

I feel that our main concern at this point is not whether the draft should be extended for 2 years or for 4 years, we know it must be extended. Our real concern, I believe, is whether or not some alternative system, other than the draft, may not be better for the armed services and better for the country.

It is my hope that from the study to be started soon by the special subcommittee of the Armed Services Committee, there will come recommendations for a better method of recruitment than the military draft. And it is my hope that the Congress will accept the findings of the special subcommittee.

The fact that this study of our military manpower system is being made by this special subcommittee should alert our military leaders to the fact that they cannot lean indefinitely on the crutch of the draft to maintain the necessary manpower level.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that the study being initiated by the special subcommittee can make a tremendously important contribution to our national defense program. It is my hope that from this study there will result a better use of men in the services and a recruitment program that will give us adequate defense forces under a system based on our American principle of equal and fair treatment for all.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RHODES].

Mr. RHODES of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, in recent weeks I have received a lot of mail from my constituents and from national religious leaders and others in opposition to the extension of the Draft Act.

Many questions have been raised as to whether better ways are possible in providing for our national defense and security.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I feel that there is considerable merit to the proposal for a 2-year extension and the selection of a committee to make a thorough study of our Selective Service System.

In the minds of many of our citizens is a belief that under the present draft law there is tremendous waste, not only of money, but of talented youth, who may give more valuable service in our national defense than by serving in the Armed Forces.

Serious thought needs to be given to suggestions to increase military pay and inducements to bring an adequate number of volunteers into our Armed Forces.

These are only a few of the reasons, Mr. Chairman, why I expect to support the amendment which will be offered for a 2-year extension.

I have profound respect for this committee and its distinguished chairman. I believe that we have little choice but to extend the draft law. But I sincerely believe that these most challenging and dangerous times call for a more thorough study of this crucial issue.

We in the Congress have an obligation to give full and serious deliberation to the effect of this program on the lives of the Nation's young men subject to its provisions.

In the present operation of the military conscription law less than half the young men of draft age actually enter the Armed Forces. There is much waste of manpower and talent. This and other inefficiencies associated with the present system need to be carefully reviewed.

According to the report of the Cordiner Committee, partially implemented by the last Congress, the solution to the personnel problem in the Armed Forces today "is not to draft more men to stand and look helplessly at the machinery, but to give the man already in the Armed Forces the incentives to stay long and try hard enough to take on higher responsibilities."

One of the basic reasons given for supporting the Career Incentive Pay Act last year was that it could eventually eliminate further need for conscription. Controls have always been repulsive in our free society. We accept them only when we must in the national interest.

But now dynamic changes are taking place in military concepts and strategy. Reason, good sense, and sound judgment call for a most careful and thorough study of the whole question.

A logical approach to this problem is to renew the draft law for 2 years, and to establish a special commission to study all of the aspects of the military manpower problem.

This, Mr. Chairman, is the way to a stronger Nation, not only in a military way, but morally and economically, and in winning the respect of the free world.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from California [Mr. ROOSEVELT].

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Chairman, it is always a difficult decision to oppose the distinguished and experienced gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON]. The Navy and the Defense Departments have benefited from his guidance for many years. So it is with profound reluctance that I find myself in agreement with the powerful argument of my colleague from Iowa [Mr. WOLF]. The inadequacies, the extravagant waste and cost, the favoritism and discrimination in favor of those able to go to college, the strain put upon those seeking jobs but subject to the draft, the proven inability of those drafted to see any desirable future in the Armed Forces, the many claims of poor training even while in service, all these and more point to loud warning signals. Granting it would be unwise to drop the draft until a satisfactory system of providing military manpower is found, I see no justification for extending it for more than 2 years. In that time a strenuous effort to find a better way could be undertaken. Extension for 4 years merely means the soul-searching examination will be postponed and the standpatters would be further encouraged. The needs of our national defense are such that it seems a strange argument that we should extend for 4 years an admittedly weak program. We need and must have only the best. This bill postpones the best until it may be too late. The argument that a 2-year extension would be a sign of weakness is not convincing if in the meantime we were making strenuous efforts to get a really sound system in operation. And if the Defense Department can only operate if it has a 4-year authority, it shows how inflexible and therefore inefficient is that Department. I shall vote for a 2-year extension; if that fails I shall vote for the bill but with the hope that the Armed Services Committee will press for a better system of attaining our military manpower and present it to the House within a year.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. STRATTON].

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 2260, both as a very junior member of the Committee on Armed Services and also as one who has been connected for the past 16 years with the Reserve Forces of our armed services.

Mr. Chairman, as we debate this bill we are at present in the midst of a great debate that has gone on in the newspapers and also at the other end of the Capitol on the subject of whether we are today doing enough to build up the Armed Forces and the national defense of the Nation, specifically with regard to missiles, and whether we are doing enough to stay ahead of the Soviet Union in this regard. In fact, as part of this examination, we of the Armed Services Committee have been having the advantage of testimony by the Secretary of Defense on this subject and have been examining him at length. I for one am not sure whether we are doing all that we should be doing. I am not sure whether we are perhaps not incurring too great a risk in the decisions we have made, too great a risk in the great struggle that is going on between the free world and the Soviet Union.

It could well be that as a result of our deliberations the Congress will decide more money should be spent in this area and that greater emphasis should be called for to provide for the necessary defense. How may we, if we are likely to call for a greater expenditure of money to provide for the national defense, expect to get by in providing for that defense with anything less in terms of personal effort, anything less in terms of personal sacrifice? There is no easy way, it seems to me, to peace or strength or freedom.

We hear a great deal about push-button warfare, but no one has yet come forward with any scheme that would eliminate the human individual, no immaculate way to provide for military strength. Some of the great nations in the world's history are no longer great, chiefly the Roman Empire, because they felt that there was some soft or easy or convenient way of remaining strong, and because they were unwilling to make what sacrifices might be needed and to do some of the hard and unpleasant jobs that were required to maintain their strength.

Let us today, Mr. Chairman, not follow down that same easy, tempting, but disastrous path. Let us not call for more billions for the construction of missiles and then give ourselves or the American people the misleading impression that security can be found without effort and hard work on the part of our citizens universally.

I think that there has been an impression given that perhaps service in uniform is something that ought to be avoided. The truth has sometimes been lost sight of that military service ought to be something regarded as a part of citizenship, something that is an opportunity to take part in a greater and a different way in the necessary operations of a free government.

I think sometimes we have been inclined to stress too much the rights of democratic citizens, Mr. Chairman, without recognizing that there is a corresponding responsibility and obligation. I doubt if we could raise the funds that may be necessary to meet the increased effort in missiles and other forms of advanced technology simply through voluntary contributions by the citizens of our Nation. We have taxes and yet, Mr. Chairman, no one has suggested in this House that because we have compulsory taxes, democracy is going out the window. I think we, as a nation, should recognize there is a great deal to be said for the citizen soldier serving as a part of his citizenship and that it is not necessarily the right way to expect that we can build our strength purely on paid professional mercenaries.

I had the privilege, Mr. Chairman, of sitting in the gallery of this Chamber in August 1941 when this measure was up for its original extension and when the extension, as the distinguished gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS] remarked yesterday, carried by a single vote. Nobody will, perhaps, know to what extent that vote may have persuaded the Japanese military war lords to press their surprise attack on our country which materialized some 3 months later, an attack that even then was in the planning stage. Let us join together, Mr. Chairman, in supporting the legislation as it has come from the committee so that when the vote is taken our enemies and also the people of the United States themselves will know that the American people today, no less than in the day when George Washington was at Valley Forge, are not summer soldiers or sunshine patriots, but that we still stand ready and determined to do everything that is necessary to keep us strong and to keep us free.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WAMPLER].

Mr. WAMPLER. Mr. Chairman and fellow colleagues, I speak to you at a time when things so preciously dear to us are endangered in the world today. The defense and security of America requires support in a department that could determine our very existence in the days that lie ahead. I refer, fellow Members, to the extension of the Selective Service Act for 4 more years. As a member of the Committee on Armed Services, I have had the privilege of listening to the recommendations of our top leaders who are charged with guiding our military forces. Their comments were of a serious nature and displayed a great concern with our military end-strength and manner of providing adequate manpower which will meet the military needs of this great country. To me, such a decision is of great importance since it affects the lives of thousands of young men aspiring to mold their careers as they so choose. As a former football coach, my entire life has been devoted to guiding and counseling thousands of young men in all phases of life. As a commanding officer of a Reserve unit, I have had the privilege of channeling thousands of young bluejackets into the U.S. Navy. In all my observations, I have found the Military Establishments at a loss when it comes to procuring the number of personnel necessary to perform their assigned tasks, which are so vitally necessary. Possibly, this is due primarily to your responsibility and my responsibility and to all of the military laymen in the United States of America. I say we possibly have not encouraged our youngsters to go into the military as we do in other fields of endeavor. Therefore, it is my privilege to recommend that we endorse this bill and have the Committee on Armed Services review it every year, and then when we find that it has served its purpose to discontinue it.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PORTER].

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to express misgivings about this bill; misgivings which I know some of my colleagues share. I know that we agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. STRATTON] that we want to show the world, and of course this Nation, that we as a Congress are ready and determined to keep ourselves strong and free. There is no question about that. I do not have any illusions about what will be done today. This bill will pass by a big vote.

I am a member of the Reserves, and have been for many years. I served, as many of you did, in World War II. Like many of you, I have boys who will soon be eligible to be drafted. I am certainly against the 4-year extension. The 2-year extension brings it before us again in 2 years, to make another hard decision to draft boys. That is a hard decision that we ought to face at least every 2 years. I hope it will be only a 2-year extension.

I also have misgivings about the time that was given for public discussion of the draft law this year. I have great respect for the chairman of this committee and for the committee. Perhaps if I had served on the committee and sat there and listened to the testimony these misgivings would not be in my mind. But they are there, and I want to express them. It is interesting to note that four freshmen Congressmen have been expressing their misgivings. They have been almost alone on the floor today in expressing their misgivings. It may be that they need more experience, too. Perhaps they do not realize what is involved. Of course everybody admits that this law has many unfair aspects. We pay doctors and dentists more. They are making sacrifices. Other people are also making sacrifices, doing jobs at less than the market price. The draft is far from universal. It favors boys who can go to school, boys who can afford to get married, boys who can go abroad. But that is not the point. The point is, Is the national security dependent upon the extension of this law? I cannot believe that forcing boys to serve for 2 years is fundamental to our national security. Is this the best use of our defense dollar? What are the feasible alternatives? How can you vote not to have the draft? What would happen if we did not vote to extend the draft? I am sure that the Armed Services Committee would very quickly make arrangements, and that the Defense Department would be up here with testimony on a number of feasible alternatives on what we could do to have a force made up of volunteers, volunteers even as people who work in our civil service are volunteers. What would we do if we arranged to do away with the draft? The gentleman from Connecticut said that this program should have a hard, critical look. I agree. I hope that a subcommittee will give it this look. I have heard that the subcommittee has many newly elected members on it. I also hope there would be a hard, critical look given by some civilian organizations, made up of persons who are informed and concerned; people who want to see a better method of achieving our military security than by an unfair peacetime conscription.

I intend to cast a vote against this bill because I am not convinced that peacetime conscription is necessary to keep America strong and free. I am convinced that there are more feasible alternatives.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PORTER] has expired.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. DOYLE], which will close the debate on this side.

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include pertinent material.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Chairman, I think that many of my colleagues have learned during these 12 years that I have been here in Congress that it is not easy for me, because of my beliefs and background, to support a 4-year extension, nor to favor a draft. In view of the very brilliant debate, both for and against the bill, which has already occurred I would not speak if I did not feel a sense of duty to do so. But there are a few thoughts that I wish to express that have not been mentioned quite enough, in my humble opinion. Also a few points that not even yet, been pointed up to position.

Therefore, I will take this brief time to give you, extemporaneously, my viewpoint. As you know, I am a member of the Armed Services Committee. I sat in committee during the presentation of this problem to the committee during a week of hearings. Let me say again, I have not felt comfortable to conclude to vote three times previously for the draft. But due consideration of our Nation's survival forced me to. And may I say to you Members who are opposing this on manifestly sincere beliefs in religious principles—I recognize that two or three of you have emphasized that and I think that a couple of Members have sort of implied, although they did not do it in any mean attitude or of disrespect, but they did imply a sort of feeling that maybe members of the Armed Services Committee which submitted this bill for some reason or other, were being bossed or controlled by military thinking and wishes or dictates. May I assure you that the 37 members of the Armed Services Committee are not less dedicated; are not less free of outside control; are not less free of prejudice or bias than are other Members of this House who are not on that committee. And may I also say to you frankly, that I have found that members of the Armed Services Committee are a group of patriotically dedicated men anxious for world peace just as much as any men in this House. I know some pray for peace with humility and faith. So I speak conclusively myself, as one of those men just as anxious for world peace and just as dedicated to a proposition that, pray God, there shall never be another war. But, Mr. Chairman, may I say to you that having traveled in Europe, in the Black Sea area, and in the Mediterranean area this last summer as I did, having the benefit of being briefed by military personnel at the top level in England, France, and Germany, in Switzerland, in Italy, in Greece, and in Turkey, and in the Mediterranean and Black Sea areas, I came home convinced, even though I did not want to be, that I could not again fail to vote for the extension of the draft if the military declared it again a necessity for our survival. I hoped it would not be for more than 2 years, at most. That was my humble judgment. But I came from that experience last summer in my studies for the Armed Services Committee overseas and the experience before the committee hearings all last week constrains me to now say to you, that I shall vote for the 4-year term. Whenever I find another man disagreeing with me, I thank God I live in a nation which does not let us force him to agree with me.

The word "survival" has not been used in this debate yet today; it has not been mentioned by a single soul. Yet, if I did not believe that we are in a fight in which our very survival is at stake as a free nation, I would not vote for any draft. But that is the sort of world we continue to be in today. We will be for some time, I fear, you cannot gainsay. I know of no evidence and do not believe you do, from any sincere religious body or any other group, that constrains me to believe that we are not in a cold war, which could become a hot war. Our potential enemy leaves us no choice but to continue to be militarily strong enough to defend ourselves.

And we are close to a hot war. I was in a certain part of this difficult world this summer in my official work, where I saw submarine nets stretched across a very, very narrow opening between two great bodies of water; at each end of those indicative and warning nets was a warship of the Turkish nation, a faithful ally and friend, ready to draw closed those submarine nets on a moment's notice. It made me realize how difficult a problem our military and Executive has. If that is not getting about as close to a hot war as any patriotic American wants to get I do not know what is hot. We must not lose the existing cold war. If we do, our very survival is at issue, instantly.

Let me just mention two or three more points that have been referred to by others. The committee hearings have been referred to, at page 35. Under Secretary of the Army Finucane has been quoted, but quoted only in part. The part of the statement that was read is as follows:

> I think your question is an excellent one, sir. Historically, the draft law has, in the wisdom of Congress, been extended for 4 years, and we would like simply for conformity sake to carry on with the habits of the past.

That statement has been quoted by three of those who are opposed to this bill and has been relied upon with major relevancy to support their opposition to this bill.

But let me read you the balance on that page, by the Secretary, which none of them read to you:

> Actually the Congress can indeed change the law any time it wants to. The Congress is always available in the national interest, and it seems to me that 4 years is a reasonable time.

That is the part of the statement which the three gentlemen should also have read for the information of the House. I believe it would have given us more of the real picture.

One further point which I feel it is appropriate to bring to you here. I am also a member of the Committee on Un-American Activities of the House and have been for several terms. There is no committee in this great body which comes more intimately in touch with the problem of national defense from the angle of subversive cold war than does your Committee on Un-American Activities of the House. May I say I know of no evidence, either in book, pamphlet, or newspaper form nor have I heard any offered here, that indicates to me the conspiracy which was initiated by Lenin and Stalin and continued by Khrushchev has stopped. That conspiracy is dedicated to conquest of the free world. The Soviet has not changed this decision. In fact, it has not abated. With all due respect to the great religious bodies, one of which I am a member of, and proud of it, one of the great mistakes some of those great religious bodies make is that sometimes they are anticipating, through their hopes and through their earnest prayers, that the world now is ready for us to expect world peace from the Soviets. I grant that world peace is the natural hope of all thinking persons, true, but there never can be a safe approach by us to a bona fide world peace with only one party, and that our Nation, wanting world peace. And the Soviets are not asking for world peace except on their terms. They demand we negotiate on their terms.

I learned of enough actual instances in the last 12 months which, I believe, ought to convince any reasonable man that the Soviets are deliberately trying to set up incidents which will make it impossible for a just and fair world peace, except on their terms. Just the other day the Soviets gave notice they would demand to retain the right of veto to any agreement on disarmaments. What does that mean if it does not mean that they want to continue the upper hand and power in all negotiations? Peace will only come between nations dedicated to it and controlled by utmost good faith at all times.

I feel I cannot now do less than to remind you, that the reason we need this 4-year extension, in my judgment, or one of the reasons, is that we are in a cold war which is ever present and you know it. Why, then, take a chance of weakening the military strength which we all know is not only necessary as a deterrent, but it is our survival that is involved. That is why I am for this extension. It is our survival that is involved, and we cannot survive if we cannot deter; and we cannot survive if we cannot win a world peace founded on mutual good faith. Winning means not only for our own sake, may I say, not only for our own sake, but we must recognize that we are the leaders in the free world community. We cannot safely change that relationship to our allies.

I saw on my trip some conditions which shocked me when I realized, for instance, that over there thousands of our American boys are on guard 24 hours a day. They are on guard for us here today. I saw them, I was with them. They are on the alert for all free peoples. What are they on the alert for? Do you think it is unnecessary? Do you think it is unsound for the American Air Force and Navy to be on the alert over there for 24 hours a day? I was with the Sixth Fleet for several days, and they were on the alert 24 hours a day also. We must not weaken their support—not one iota.

I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that a special subcommittee of our committee has already been appointed in connection with this study and that subcommittee will bring in a report before many months. Certainly that report should come in before a year.

I believe my Nation's security and the security of the free world dictates to us to vote for this bill as reported by the Committee on Armed Services. Our survival is at stake.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PUCINSKI].

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from California a minute ago spoke of the special subcommittee investigating the manpower needs of this country. Could we have some idea as to when the chairman envisions a report from this committee?

Mr. VINSON. I will state to the gentleman and for the benefit of the House that after consultation with various Members and particularly with some of our new colleagues on the Committee on Armed Services the other day, I was authorized to name a subcommittee, and this was the jurisdiction:

Said subcommittee shall have jurisdiction to make inquiry of all phases of defense manpower utilization, including but not limited to, military and civilian personnel, tables of organization, the utilization of technically trained personnel in technical positions, the extent to which military personnel are assigned to civilian-type duties, the utilization of military personnel to provide personal services to other military personnel, a determination as to whether additional combat organizations may be created by more efficient utilization and without increasing the total strength of the military forces, and such other matters as may be pertinent to any of the foregoing;

That the subcommittee shall meet at such times as may be designated by the chairman thereof.

Now, it was our objective to confer authority upon this subcommittee to take into consideration the whole manpower subject matter. So, I designated the distinguished member of our committee who is also a member of the Democratic caucus, the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. MELVIN PRICE, as chairman; Mr. LEROY H. ANDERSON, Mr. DANIEL B. BREWSTER, Mr. FRANK KOWALSKI, Mr. FRED WAMPLER, Mr. SAMUEL S. STRATTON, Mr. JEFFERY COHELAN, and for the minority our distinguished friend from Pennsylvania, Mr. GAVIN, Mr. O'KONSKI, Mr. GUBSER, and Mr. BECKER. These gentlemen will make this inquiry that you make reference to.

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Chairman, I will certainly yield to your better judgment and support this legislation, but I am hopeful that this special committee is going to come out with a report and recommendation as quickly as posible, and if there is a better way of obtaining the young men that our Armed Forces need; better than the way we are prescribing today, I certainly hope they will bring it up.

Mr. VINSON. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. PUCINSKI. I am voting for this legislation with a heavy heart and with great misgivings. I just completed, before I came to the Congress, a very intensive survey in Chicago on teen-age gangs and juvenile delinquency, and I find that the draft has a very important effect on the present development of our young people. Every youngster in my city between the ages of 18 and 26 has to register for the draft. This means that hundreds of thousands of youngsters are forced to live in a shadow of constant doubt as to their future when actually only a few thousands are ultimately drafted. This uncertainty that these young people are constantly faced with makes it virtually impossible for them to plan their future in an orderly manner. The most tragic aspect of this situation is that many young men who graduate from high school and who do not, or cannot because of economic reasons, go to college find it impossible to get decent employment because the first thing they are asked by a potential employer is what is his draft status. The moment a youngster admits that he is eligible for the draft he is either given the lowest type of employment or, as is the case in many instances, flatly denied employment. This tragic condition cannot be permitted to continue and we must provide some program for those youngsters who are under the shadow of the draft, but are never called, to be permitted to adjust their lives in an orderly manner. I could not begin to tell you the hardships that this situation is causing to thousands of youngsters who are not seeking a way to shirk responsibility but, who, because of the cumbersome mechanics of the draft, are involuntarily plunged into this pool of teen-age idleness. So I am really hopeful that this committee will come up with some recommendations very quickly.

Mr. VINSON. I feel confident, I will say to my friend from Illinois, that some worthwhile accomplishments will be the result of this investigation by this committee, because it is staffed with very able, qualified men.

Mr. PUCINSKI. How long will it take?

Mr. VINSON. I am hoping they will finish their work—I cannot name any time—between now and midsummer. They should be able to finish their work in that time.

Mr. Chairman, there is no further request for time on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 17(c) of the Universal Military Training and Service Act, as amended (50 App. U.S.C. 467(c)), is amended by striking out the words "July 1, 1959" and inserting the words "July 1, 1963" in place thereof.

Mr. WINSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WINSTEAD: On page 1, line 6, immediately before the period insert the following: ", and by adding at the end thereof the following proviso: 'Provided, That no person inducted under the provisions of this Act shall be compelled to bear arms against any citizen or citizens of the United States except in case of war or national emergency hereafter declared by the Congress'."

Mr. WINSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, this is a very simple amendment. The argument for this whole act is to be prepared to fight a foreign enemy or to prevent a global war. It is very limited, as we all know, as to the number of people that will be inducted under the provisions of this act. All this amendment does is simply this, in simple language. It says that no young man inducted under the provisions of this act shall be sent into a community on a limited, local disturbance, unless we have a war or a national emergency hereafter declared by the Congress.

We give conscientious objectors the right to refuse any service whatsoever. I should like to point out to you that the provisions of this bill do one thing. Suppose you have a labor disturbance in any State of this Union. Suppose you are in a mining area, and on this limited basis we draft the son of a miner. We bring him into the service on the premise that it is to protect this country against a foreign foe. Let us assume further that a strike should develop and get out of hand, and that Federal troops should be sent into that community. I do not believe a Member of this House would consider it to be right that a local boy be ordered into his home community to bear arms against his own people. I submit to you that is the only purpose of this amendment: That we give the same consideration to those we induct as you would give to conscientious objectors who refused any service whatsoever.

Mr. BECKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BECKER. May I ask the gentleman how his amendment to this proposed legislation squares up with the Formosa resolution passed by the Congress and the Middle East resolution that was passed by the Congress, both almost unanimously? How does his amendment square up with those two resolutions?

Mr. WINSTEAD. It does not affect those two at all. This deals solely with local situations.

Mr. BECKER. Those principles deal with local situations.

Mr. WINSTEAD. But this deals with local situations within our own borders, dealing with our own people, not with foreign matters. Keep this in mind: that this amendment does not bar anyone from going unless it is against his honest convictions. A person inducted under selective service, certainly should not be sent into his home area against his own people or against his own conscientious beliefs.

I hope that the membership of this body will pass judgment on this amendment exclusively on its own merits, and without regard for political or other alien considerations. If it can be considered objectively and in the light of fairness, I am confident that it will be adopted unanimously. Surely no Member of this House would vote to deprive a patriotic American soldier, willing to fight in defense of this great Nation, the privilege of being relieved from the duty of having to bear arms against his father, his brother, his family, and his friends. I do not believe there is a Member in this House who will turn down this provision if it is understood what I am sincerely and honestly trying to do with this amendment. I think it is fair.

Mr. HOLTZMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HOLTZMAN. Would this amendment have prevented President Eisenhower from sending in the guard in Arkansas?

Mr. WINSTEAD. This does not affect the guard whatsoever. This would not have prevented President Eisenhower from sending the First Airborne Division into Little Rock. But it would have given to the son of a man in Little Rock, Ark., the right to say, "Don't send me back home to point guns and bayonets at my own people." Who wants to deny that individual that privilege? It is merely a concession to right and decency. If you want to ease tension in this country and if you want to allay strife rather than promote it, you will give serious consideration to this amendment on its merits and on the basis on which it has been submitted to you.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman from Mississippi has mentioned the coal mining region. Let me remind the gentleman that in 1921 the Army was sent into West Virginia to quell an armed march of miners. They arrested the leader of the miners. Instead of following the constitutional provision that a man should be given a speedy trial in the district in which the crime was committed, they took him across to Charleston, W. Va., and tried the leaders of the miners' march in the same courtroom where they convicted John Brown of treason; and they convicted one of the mine leaders of treason. Among the miners they tried was a minister of the gospel, and he got a stiff sentence. He was not tried before a jury of his peers, but before a three-judge Federal court setup.

Mr. WINSTEAD. I thank the gentleman from West Virginia. Will the gentleman not agree with me that the son of one of those miners should not be sent into his home and local community against his own people? My friends, that is all that this amendment does. I hope you will vote for this amendment.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 5 minutes, and that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILDAY] be recognized for the Committee on Armed Services.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, frequently we hear complaints about the executive or the judicial branch of the Government infringing on the legislative powers of the Congress. I have agreed on many of those complaints, but I do not see how you can very well claim that other branches should not infringe upon the congressional powers and, yet, be willing lightly to infringe upon the executive powers. Nothing can be clearer than that the Congress has the power to raise and support armies and to provide a Navy. Nor can anything be clearer than once raised, they pass under the control of the President as Commander in Chief for deployment orders here, there, and everywhere.

In addition to that, the language of this amendment is such that no one could ever understand what could happen under it. Let us consider, for instance, a man who serves, say, for 2 years and still has his Reserve obligation and goes into the National Guard of his State to serve. Of course, the Governor has command of his National Guard for the purpose of putting down civil commotion. Where will that man be under the provisions of this amendment? Because he has been inducted, you understand for a 2-year period, and then in turn, because of the additional Reserve obligation, goes into the National Guard of his State for the purpose of discharging that obligation.

This amendment reads: "That no person inducted under the provisions of this act shall be compelled to bear arms against any citizen or citizens of the United States."

In addition to that, where would you be in the event of insurrection in the United States—by American citizens? But insurrection nevertheless—with provisions in our statutes for the President, and he has the right and, of course, he has the constitutional obligation to put down insurrection. There are statutes defining the manner in which he may do it—with the Regular Army or with the National Guard. So where would these people be? You would be demobilizing the very people who would be in a position to put down insurrection.

Mr. WINSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield.

Mr. WINSTEAD. The gentleman spoke of the National Guardsman when he comes to the National Guard. I do not know how it is in all the States of the Union, but the Adjutant General of my State says that he never, when they are called out for any disturbance within the State, sends a local boy into his own home or local community. I do not believe the President of the United States should do so either.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, I regret that I cannot yield further to the gentleman. I only have 5 minutes, and the gentleman had his 5 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, the point is that under the language of the gentleman's amendment, it is provided that no person inducted hereunder shall be assigned to this type of duty, and the man who is inducted and then enters the National Guard is a man who has been inducted. He is serving a compulsory tour in the National Guard, under an act of Congress, to discharge his Reserve obligation. So that you are setting up here a matter of proscribing the powers of the President as Commander in Chief of the Army, and of the Governor as commander of the State militia. You leave them powerless in the event of a civil disturbance or insurrection in the United States. This is not something to take lightly. I do not agree with all that was done at Little Rock. Some of the implications are greater than have ever been brought out, but this is no time to tie the hands of the President on the question of an insurrection.

Mr. WINSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield.

Mr. WINSTEAD. Furthermore, you know that every man who serves a 2-year tenure of duty does not go into the National Guard unless he volunteers and is accepted. He is not forced under any induction procedure to serve in the National Guard.

Mr. KILDAY. But once he makes that election he is obligated to serve. He is a man who was inducted.

Mr. WINSTEAD. Do you believe for a minute that any National Guardsman would be involved as you discuss this?

What I am trying to do is to give a man who has a conscientious conviction——

Mr. KILDAY. I do not know how you are going to have a military organization with men deciding that they have conscientious objections. If you are going to have a military organization of any kind, whether National Guard or Reserves, or what not, the first thing he is going to have to do is to take orders.

Mr. FLYNT. Mr. Chairman, I support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WINSTEAD] because it is in keeping not only with the stated purpose of the Selective Service and Training Act but is also in keeping with the safeguards of national security. The purpose of this amendment, as stated by its author, is to insure that the Armed Forces of the United States will be used in the defense of this country and in defense of our national security and to specifically insure that persons inducted under the provisions of this act will not under any circumstances be called upon to bear arms against American citizens.

One of the most tragic incidents in the history of our Nation was the use of elements of the 101st Airborne Division to patrol the classrooms, corridors, and grounds of Central High School in Little Rock, Ark., and to draw bayonets and other weapons against unoffending high school boys and girls. There can be no relation, real or imagined, between our national security and the use of armed force and Army troops against teen-age students.

The statements made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILDAY] that this amendment if adopted would preclude the Governor of a State from using National Guard units to quell domestic disorders, riots, or actions which cannot be quelled by police units are not quite accurate. The gentleman knows that neither enlisted men nor officers of the National Guard of any of the States are inducted into the National Guard under the provisions of this act. The filling of vacancies in all ranks of the National Guard is by voluntary enlistment, and there is no provision in Federal or State law for induction into National Guard units under the law which presently prevails.

It is a well-known fact that many chief executives of various States abide by a firm rule not to call out National Guard units for domestic duty, riot, or otherwise, in the locality in which such National Guard unit is normally and regularly stationed. This is a good rule and one which is almost universally followed. The same principle which is embodied in this rule exists in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

This amendment would place emphasis where emphasis should be placed, and that is on the security and defense of the United States of America, and it would clearly provide that any person inducted under provisions of this act shall not be compelled to bear arms against any American citizen except in time of war or in time of an emergency hereinafter specifically declared by the Congress of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILDAY] has expired.

All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WINSTEAD].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WINSTEAD), there were—ayes 42, noes 135.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which is at the desk.

Amendment offered by Mr. WOLF: On page 1, line 6, delete the word "July 1, 1963" and insert in lieu thereof "July 1, 1961".

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Chairman, I have three other exactly similar amendments. I ask that all four amendments be considered en bloc.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendments.

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Chairman, as I stand before you in support of my amendment I have standing with me in this position the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, the AFL–CIO, important church groups, and some very distinguished Americans many of whom are sitting with me here today in this Chamber.

Again, as I see it, the question is whether it is better to extend this act for 4 years or to extend it for 2 years, review and renew if need be at that time. Or should Congress just casually stand by and give?

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILDAY] referred to page 38. I would like to acknowledge to the gentleman from Texas, that I too referred to that page. I think it proves my case for 2 years. I was in error slightly in some of my figures, sir, but the statistics shown here I think bear out my contention. And without belaboring everyone who has studied this and reached a different opinion I am going to repeat the statement that each year since they began to create more fringe benefits the percentage of reenlistments has improved. So I think this fact makes a case for my stand on improving the incentives for reenlistment.

I would like to point out something else in the testimony, and may I say to the Members I think it is very much worth their consideration, a little exchange between one of the members of the committee and Gen. Curtis LeMay of the Air Force. I think this testimony is worthy of your serious consideration. A member of the committee asked this question:

With regard to your observation about how soon you felt the effective end of a nuclear war would come—2 or 3 days—it is not your opinion that the war would actually end within 2 or 3 days?

And General LeMay answered:

I said the decisive phase. There may be some fighting, mopping up and things of that sort. But the decision will have been rendered by that time.

If the serious phase of a future war may last only a few days, cannot Congress afford to take a look every 2 years at this matter of extending the draft?

The gentleman from California [Mr. DOYLE] quoted much of Mr. Finucane's testimony. I would like to read what he quoted again. He said:

I think your question is an excellent one. sir. Historically, the draft law has, in the wisdom of Congress, been extended for 4 years, and we would like simply for conformity sake to carry on with the habits of the past.

Actually, the Congress can, indeed, change the law any time it wants. The Congress is always available in the national interest. And it seems to me that 4 years is a reasonable time. If the Congress desired to change the law 2 years from now or 1 year from now, or at any time, it would be, of course, perfectly within its rights and prerogatives.

I think Mr. Finucane makes my case eloquently well. Congress has the power to extend the draft for any length of time.

So, why not let us vote for 2 years for the draft and then review it, and, if we need to, vote it again.

I am happy, too, that the Armed Services Committee has in its wisdom appointed this study committee. I think it is a step in the right direction. I am happy that it has done so and I hope that this study committee, as has been suggested, will report back in a year, and then in 2 years we can make our decision again regarding the draft.

Mr. Chairman, I am happy to say I have considerable support for the 2-year extension here on the floor.

If there are no questions, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the amendments offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WOLF] and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BAILEY].

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I did not stand for the purpose of asking for time. It was my intention to vote for at least one part of the amendments if we could get a separate vote, but I understand they have been offered en bloc.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendments were offered en bloc.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I did not ask for time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, as I listened to the debate over extension of the Selective Service and reviewed the material that has come to my desk, and read the letters, and they have all been on one side—in opposition—I find the following arguments being used in opposition and I would like briefly to summarize the matter as I have seen it:

First. The present draft does not pay the recruit an adequate wage. It demands his compulsory contribution without adequate compensation; yet it results in a very expensive and very wasteful use of manpower;

Second. The draft has not in fact been universal and has operated unfairly in its demands upon the young generation;

Third. It is not related to the needs of modern warfare, which calls for more highly trained technicians than even a 2-year, much less a 6-month, program can achieve;

Fourth. As a result it creates an illusion of strength through numbers rather than the reality of strength through skills, morale, and organization;

Fifth. It is a continued invasion of the rights of privacy of American citizens. It is alien to our historical tradition; indeed, many of America's settlers were people who came here to escape the militarization of European countries;

Sixth. It interrupts the educational program and planning for a career, or marriage and family, of the younger generation, and thus ultimately weakens the real security and strength of our Nation;

Seventh. Perpetuation of the draft endorses the present negative and unimaginative military and foreign policy of the administration. It admits failure to believe that we can move toward reconciliation of international differences and learn how to live together. It assumes we must concentrate on coextinction rather than coexistence;

Eighth. It extends the military influence on American life contrary to our constitutional intent to maintain civil dominance over the military;

Ninth. The program was originally defended as a means for buying time. The theory originally was that we would use this time to develop peaceful alternatives.

Time is running out; extension of the draft may be a desperate gamble, causing us to forget that "time is running against us," as General Bradley said, "with the speed of a sputnik."

Tenth. The consequence of all these factors is that our society offers a poor motivation for young men to accept military service without compulsion, or, at least, so argue those favoring extension of the draft. However, a voluntary military establishment whose basic cadre included those making an extended stay, if not a career of military service, would provide us with the kind of personnel that modern methods of defense require. Such volunteers would have better motivation and would do a better job. They could be secured by a change in manpower personnel practices such as the following: (a) Better pay for recruits; (b) a better program to hold reservists; (c) greater use of civilians for support-type activities of transportation, housing, food, and so forth; (d) more widespread use of local support, including nationals at overseas bases for the nonmilitary activities. This type of program would at the same time serve to reduce our total manpower requirements and make the activities of those who served more significant and meaningful.

Eleventh. It is time that the Nation challenge its youth not merely to learn how to launch an intercontinental ballistic missile that will mean the end of civilization, but instead challenge its youth to enlist for peace, to volunteer for peace-building activity the world around. The Nation ought to be planning to wage war on man's ancient enemies, which are disease, hunger, misery, and poverty. For this is the only war in which all mankind can be victorious.

For all of these reasons I must oppose the present 4-year extension of the draft.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JOHANSEN].

Mr. JOHANSEN. Mr. Chairman, with the greatest reluctance, I shall vote for the extension of the draft.

I recognize the unpleasant practicalities of the situation. I seriously question whether the manpower necessary to meet and maintain our defense commitments can otherwise be assured.

It is one thing to wish devoutly that it were otherwise—to wish that those commitments were not necessary or, being necessary, that they could be met on a strictly voluntary basis. It is quite another to default on the commitments.

To say that I do not concur in all of those commitments does not alter the fact that once made by due process of legislative and executive decision they must be fulfilled.

I oppose with all my vigor any suggestion or proposal that the draft be used for purposes of enforcing an alleged obligation of service other than of a strictly military nature. I want no part of such a totalitarian program.

I do believe that the extension ought to be limited to 2 years to correspond to the life and tenure of the Congress. If the constitutional purpose of a biennial election of the entire House and one-third of the Members of the other body is to be served, legislation of this character, in my judgment, should be subject to mandatory review by the next Congress. I do not believe that this Congress should usurp the responsibility of the succeeding Congress.

But here again, the hard practicalities of the situation require that I accept, however reluctantly, the verdict of the majority.

On one count I am particularly disturbed and distressed. The fact that the legislation here proposed to be reenacted commits American servicemen by compulsion to duty in foreign lands where their constitutional safeguards are abrogated under the status-of-forces agreements is to me totally repugnant. Yet the responsibility for this situation lies basically in the failure of Congress to address itself specifically and forthrightly to that problem. I cannot permit one wrong to be compounded by a second wrong on the fatuous theory that a right is thereby accomplished.

With these profound and disturbing reservations, I shall again, as I did 4 years ago, vote for the extension of the draft.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Chairman, failure to extend the draft will have a serious impact on the Reserves. I propose to discuss its impact in three broad areas:

First, the effects on maintenance of adequate strength;

Second, the effects on maintenance of adequate quality; and Third, the effects on maintenance of proper training participation.

Failure to extend the draft will result in serious strength deficiencies for both officer and enlisted programs in all the services. College-orientated officer procurement programs, such as ROTC, the Naval Reserve officer candidate program and the Marine Corps platoon leaders class are principal sources of officers for both the Active and Reserve Forces.

It is quite obvious that many young men join these programs in lieu of being inducted. Following completion of active duty, these officers fulfill the balance of their military obligation in the Reserve. In the case of the Army ROTC, many officers take 6 months' active duty for training after commissioning, and fulfill the remainder of their obligation in the Reserve.

In addition to the serious effects on Reserve officer strength, there would also be a damaging effect on Reserve strength in enlisted ranks. Six-month-active-duty-for-training programs, with the balance of the obligation fulfilled in the Reserve, are an important source of enlisted Reserves. An additional direct Reserve enlistment program for 6 years requires 2 years of active duty with the balance in the Reserve. There is no doubt that entrants into all of these programs are draft inspired. Finally, in the case of the Army, the inductee is the principal source of full trained manpower in the Reserve after completion of his 2-year term of active duty.

The Army has estimated that without the draft authority, there would be a deficit of 103,000 within the units for the Army Reserve by the end of fiscal year 1963. This deficit is from an overall requirement of 247,000 and would, therefore, represent a deficiency of 45 percent. Of even greater significance is the estimated deficiency in strength within the enlisted reinforcement pool of the Army Reserve. Without the draft, it is estimated that there would be a deficit of 653,000 by the end of fiscal year 1963 to meet a total requirement of 895,000 in the reinforcement pool. Although estimates have not been made for the other services, they too would have serious strength deficiences for both units and reinforcements.

Not only would the loss of draft authority jeopardize total Reserve strength, but there would be a loss in quality.

With the resulting reduction in applicants for the Reserve officer programs, selectivity and quality would suffer. In the case of enlisted programs, it is probable that the services would have to abandon the requirement of a short period of initial active duty for training in the case of nonprior enlistees into the Reserve. This would mean that the Reserves would have to revert to conducting recruit training in the armories which would make it impossible for the Reserves to meet the readiness goals required by modern concepts. Furthermore, with the depletion of enlisted personnel who enter the Reserve after 2 years of active duty, the quality of Reserves would be further compromised. Such individuals form the hard core of leadership and technical skills in the Reserve.

A final effect can be anticipated in training participation. Not only does the draft authority provide stimulus for entrance into programs which require 6 months' active duty for training, but it also insures participation in Reserve training of the individuals concerned after they have completed this initial period of active duty for training. Under the law, persons in these programs who do not participate satisfactorily in Reserve training are reported to selective service for priority induction; 2,879 such individuals were reported for priority induction in fiscal year 1958.

In summary, failure to extend the draft authority will have a damaging effect on the Reserves in respect to the maintenance of adequate strengths, quality, and training participation. It will, therefore, tend to seriously impair mobilization readiness.

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a few words on behalf of the amendment offered by my colleague from Iowa. I think the record will show conclusively that I have been a consistent advocate of a strong and balanced Military Establishment. My position is unchanged. It is, in fact, because of this very concern for the defense of the Nation that I have developed serious doubts about the quality of our present draft system. I will vote for the Wolf amendment because I believe it is necessary to extend the present system until a better one can be devised; but I believe it is important that we use those 2 years to reformulate our thinking and policies on this important matter.

One would expect that the administration, charged with the responsibility of maintaining strong and efficient Armed Forces, would come up with some new ideas in this field, but the administration is following its usual policy of drifting along with events rather than leading them. It is therefore necessary that Congress serve notice that this extension is temporary—for 2 years—and that this time will be used by Congress to formulate new policies and concepts.

There are many specific complaints, but in general terms the fundamental questions which are being raised about the present draft system are the following:

First. Is it the best method of supplying the necessary manpower for our Armed Forces or are there alternatives which would better serve this function?

Second. Does it produce an adequate Reserve Force or does it generate an enormous, expensive, and inefficient Reserve program?

Third. Is it unnecessarily costly?

Fourth. Is it fair to the Nation's youth, or is it unnecessarily arbitrary, discriminatory, and conducive to legal but demeaning draft dodging?

Each of these general questions involves a host of specific ones.

Mr. Chairman, I do not profess to have the answers to these questions, but there is a growing feeling in Congress and in the Nation that the answers are distinctly not flattering to our present draft system. They need and deserve serious investigation by Congress, and, meanwhile, I see no reason for extending this dubious system for more than 2 years.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILDAY].

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time allotted me be yielded to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILDAY].

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HALLECK. I would like to say, as a former majority leader, that it has been my responsibility to take the lead in the extension of the Draft Act heretofore, and that I have done. I am supporting the measure here today, and I trust this amendment will be defeated. The fact that we extend the authority for 4 years does not mean that it is not constantly within the province of the Congress of the United States to make any change that might seem to be indicated at any given time.

Mr. KILDAY. I thank the gentleman. Of course, what the gentleman from Indiana says is perfectly true. Funds must be appropriated every year to cover the number of men who are to be in the military service, and by the simple matter of failing to appropriate funds to maintain the larger force you can automatically terminate it each year.

Mr. Chairman, I would propound this question. Is there any Member of this floor who can seriously and conscientiously say to himself that he knows of anything in the present difficult situation that would lead him to believe or even suspect that our international situation will have eased by 1961? Is there anything in the present world situation that could cause us to believe that? Now, it is true that the Congress at one time had that sincere hope. In 1940 we passed the original Training and Service Act, and it was effective for a period of 5 years. In May 1945, with victory coming in Europe and anticipated in Japan, we extended it for 1 year. Then we extended it for 1½ months. That, of course, was to get over the period during which we were working on it. Then when we did finish working on it we extended it for only 9 months. Then we were so optimistic about the world situation that we permitted it to die in 1947.

But in 1948, we found it necessary to reenact it to revive the draft, and we did it for a period of 2 years. Then we had a 15-day extension at the end of those 2 years, to have a new conference on the bill. When we had completed that, we extended it for 1 year. But by 1951 Korea had come on and it was so evident to all that you did not have the prospect, in the immediate future, of any improvement in the world condition that Congress extended it for a period of 4 years. When that 4 years expired in 1955 it was extended for a period of 4 years, and will expire in 1959.

So our experience has shown that we are in a cold-war period, apparently of indefinite duration. Should we send out word that the Congress of the United States has refused to extend inductions under the draft for a period in excess of 2 years? Would you not be going right in accordance with what Mikoyan said when he returned to Moscow in attempting to drive a wedge between the American people and the American Government, that the American people now, as reflected by the Congress of the United States, had refused to extend the draft for 4 years, as had been done in two previous instances, but had determined to terminate it at an earlier date? Would we not be saying to those nations whose cooperation we expect that we have now become weary and that for a period of only 2 years will we make an effort to maintain the military force deemed adequate?

But the most important thing about reducing this to 2 years, and the thing that would be most unfortunate, would be to hold out to the young man who is subject to induction under the law that in a matter of 2 years the danger of his induction will have subsided, that it will no longer exist, because the Congress has said that only for a period of 2 more years is there danger of his being inducted. You lull him into a sense of false security, that it is only a matter of 2 years. I do not believe I have heard anyone here state that he believes seriously and conscientiously thinks that in 1961 there will be any better opportunity to terminate it than now.

If there is an extension of a period of 2 years only, what will happen to your voluntary enlistments? Of course we hear the great boasts of the Navy, the Air Force, and the Marine Corps that they are made up of volunteers only, but experience has shown that without the compulsion on entering the military service those who now rely on volunteering would have a very, very difficult time in securing their volunteer force. I do not recall one word from any of those services before our committee that they could maintain a voluntary force of the present size if it were not for the compulsion which exists because of this induction.

Should you reduce this to a period of 2 years you will be upsetting what the program must be. It must continue further than 1961. You are leading the Russians to believe we have wearied. You are leading those who cooperate with us to draw the same conclusion. You are attempting to disillusion the young men of the United States, to whom you would hold out here a false hope that they were not going to be subject to the draft after a period of 2 years.

Mr. IRWIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. IRWIN. Will what the gentleman says suggest you are holding out a false hope 4 years from now?

Mr. KILDAY. No; I do not think so. I take the position that this is probably an indefinite period of time. I am very sorry to say that but I really believe that it is. The side is going to win the cold war which has the stamina to remain strong throughout. When you are dealing with things of this kind, once you become weak that is when they are going to pounce on you. For two consecutive times the extension has been for a period of 4 years. Ever since we got rid of the fool's paradise in which we were living when we permitted our Armed Forces at the end of World War II to disintegrate it has been the policy to extend it for a period of 4 years.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WOLF].

The amendments were rejected.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, as this debate now comes to a close on this most important bill, I would like most sincerely and respectfully to say to all my colleagues that while some may have differences of opinion as to what might have been, or should be embodied in this bill, and that while the bill may not be as each of us desire in its entirety, I am sure it will have your approval. I know each and every one of you to be a loyal, sincere American. You want to do what is best for the country. I sincerely hope this afternoon that when the final rollcall is had on this bill that we can come up with practically a unanimous vote. Why do I so earnestly hope for such a result? Because today every free nation in the world is watching what we do on this vitally important defense measure. Our final decision on the passage of this bill will have a great impact on the free peoples of every nation throughout the world. An affirmative, strong vote here today strengthens the will of the peoples of our allies who want to continue to be free and the will of those who are striving for freedom. On this defense measure the military leaders of this country and the leaders in the House of Representatives on both sides of the aisle are in agreement. I emphasize we are acting upon a measure on which there is unanimous agreement on the part of our military leaders. We are also acting with unity, with complete agreement on both sides of the political aisle. We are acting on a measure reported by the Committee on Armed Services which year after year so diligently studies these matters, and has the responsibility of knowing our defense needs.

So by overwhelmingly passing this bill we are sending word to the people of the world that we stand together as a united people to maintain a strong military posture. We reassure the free people of the world that there is hope. By our action here today we say to any possible aggressor nation that we have, and are determined to have now and in the future, the military strength to deter any aggression. Four years ago on February 8, 1955, to be exact, we had this same matter before us. On the rollcall vote we had 394 in favor of the 4-year extension of the draft and only 4 against. I hope we will be as emphatic on this vote today.

Secretary of State Dulles is presently overseas to deal with the troublesome problem with respect to the city of Berlin. When the news of the favorable action of the Congress on this bill reaches him, he will have definite evidence to reassure all the free nations of the world of our determination to cooperate for the survival of the free peoples of the world. I hope we have a decisive vote for this measure. Our national security, our ability to defend ourselves—freedom itself is at stake.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois and I hope that if Secretary of State Dulles boasts while he is in Europe about how Congress has extended conscription in this country for 4 years, that he in all fairness calls upon foreign governments to stop reducing the obligated service of their conscripts.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILDAY] spoke of the renewal of the draft just before the war in Korea. Yes, conscription was renewed at that time and, exclusive of South Koreans, Americans did 95 percent of the fighting and dying and all the financing of that war.

Where were those so-called allies in the United Nations when that brutal war was being fought? Not a single other country provided more than a comparative handful of combat troops. Are these free world friends really interested in stopping Communist aggression?

Time after time today it has been stated on the floor of the House that conscription of American boys must be continued in order to make some kind of an impression on foreigners. It is time, it seems to me, that they made some impression upon us other than to take everything that is not nailed down.

Mr. Chairman, I have supported extensions of the draft in the past and would support an extension of 2 years today. What is wrong with Congress having the opportunity to review this legislation every 2 years, dealing as it does with the lives and fortunes of thousands of our young men?

I cannot support a 4-year extension.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, of course, it is all right to vest authority in those charged with our national defense, but it might be well to put some restrictions on that authority. That statement is made because many of us have a distinct recollection of the time when General Hershey, as he is now, was charged with the enforcement of the law. The Congress, by an almost unanimous vote, wrote into the resolution certain exemptions with reference to agricultural workers. General Hershey paid no attention to that exemption. Take a look at the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 91, part 1, page 831; volume 91, part 2, page 1503; volume 91, part 11, page A2098; and volume 91, part 8, page 9914, which should be sufficient to show the then situation. If you will look back you will find that the district now represented by Mr. MEADER, the district then represented by Mr. Michener called the attention of the House to the fact that General Hershey and his subordinates charged with the interpretation of that law or the application of it, went into the State of Michigan and directed the draft boards in Michigan to disregard the amendment. It is all right. We may need this kind of legislation, but if we are going to let individual officers in the Armed Services follow the course of the Supreme Court and substitute their ideas as to what the Congress meant when it wrote the legislation in place of what we said or wrote there is nothing I can do about it. Give some a little authority they follow their own thinking.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. Section 1 of the Act of August 3, 1950, chapter 537, as amended (71 Stat. 203), is amended by striking out the words "July 1, 1959" and inserting the words "July 1, 1963" in place thereof.

SEC. 3. Section 16 of the Dependents Assistance Act of 1950, as amended (50 App. U.S.C. 2216), is amended by striking out the words "July 1, 1959" and inserting the words "July 1, 1963" in place thereof.

SEC. 4. Section 9 of the Act of June 27, 1957, Public Law 85–62 (71 Stat. 208), is repealed.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 8, strike out the "repealed" and insert "amended by striking out the words 'July 1, 1959' and inserting the words 'July 1, 1963' in place thereof."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Chairman, I regret that adequate consideration was not accorded in the hearings to voluntary alternatives to the draft or even to programs to insure improved training and utilization of military manpower required by the problems of the space age.

I respectfully submit that these training and utilization problems should have been considered and settled by the Congress before the extension of the draft. Certainly our committee should have been briefed by the Secretary of Defense and departmental experts before the draft bill was considered.

Thus, the proposal is in a sense a sort of legislative and parliamentary weightlessness—the labored application of 19th century, Prussianized, military techniques to the incredibly complex, technical and scientific problems of the nuclear, space age.

It is clear to most thinking people, I believe, that ordinary draftees are not performing, and cannot adequately perform, the extremely technical tasks of the Armed Forces in this missile age. Highly trained personnel are required today. They must not only undergo long, intensive training and practice and be of a high order of intelligence, but they must be willing to make the services their career. They must be a scientifically and technically trained professional force—able to master the intricate techniques that have become absolutely essential to our defense setup.

We need more highly trained technologists at Cape Canaveral and similar bases and in all related advanced defense work. While men will be necessary in the mass for conventional defense operations, the primary need today is for highly trained specialists, and I do not believe these men can be secured in sufficient numbers and quality under the draft as it is currently operated.

We all recognize the fact that only the Army needs or employs the draft today, that the draft is disrupting the lives and education of all young men, that it works grave inequities on many, that in peacetime it is inconsistent with our free institutions, that it is not producing the kind of permanent career, professionalized specialists we need in the space age.

I agree that, to an extent not precisely evaluated and perhaps overemphasized, the draft may stimulate enlistment in the Navy, Air Force and Marines. But there is no evidence that it stimulates reenlistment; the opposite is the case, it does not.

But the fact remains that we have not adequately explored the enlistment-producing alternatives of radically revising our manpower procurement and training methods, stepping up the incentives by appropriate pay readjustments and driving ahead with a broad, bold campaign in the schools, colleges, laboratories, factories, on the farms and byways of the Nation to attract more capable, ambitious young men into career opportunities in the armed services and to train them as they should be trained these days.

We might also carefully explore the possibilities of inaugurating training programs that would not involve taking young men away from their schools, their jobs, and their families—local area and community programs that would embrace intensive training in related military fields wtih special emphasis upon scientific and technological requirements that would appropriately meet our need for well trained specialists and their proper assignment and utilization.

I cannot understand why Congress should extend the draft until these vital questions have been most carefully studied and discussed. Certainly to extend it for 4 years would be unsound and unrealistic.

Nor can I in any event understand why this Congress should be asked to extend this system with all its admitted infirmities for another long, 4-year period without first making some effort to correct the plain, palpable shortcomings, weaknesses and inadequacies which we all know exist in the draft system.

For a long time to come we will need sizable and substantial conventional forces and weaponry. The foot soldier with his small arms and rifle still has, and will have, an important place in our defense, civil defense and domestic, and oversea forces.

But it is a great mistake, it could be a fatal mistake, to try to train our Armed Forces in conventional systems alone, as is being done to such a large extent with draftees at present.

The Army, Navy, Air Force, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, various Reserves and the National Guard comprise our ready, or nearly ready, manpower force. We must have them in sufficient numbers. I urge that they should be organized and trained along modern lines, following modern concepts.

National conscription and the draft based on compulsion and sheer mass strength, while suitable in 19th-century warfare, cannot be adequate or effective in peacetime defense in this day and age.

If we are to survive in the tough, competitive race in which we are engaged, we must not only select our best, and give them proper incentives to serve, but we must give them the advanced, technological training and education without which no war or military operation can be efficiently and successfully conducted today.

Drafted young men forced to serve for 6 months or 2 years and then returned to their homes, while the fast-moving, military-scientific parade leaves them far behind, cannot hope to meet the manpower requirements of this day and age.

I cannot subscribe to, nor do I approve of, the kind of logic and consistency of military policy which cuts the size of the Army, the Reserves, the National Guard, and other components, as has been done, and then seeks to justify the draft of additional young men from civilian life.

Nor can I reconcile the draft with the fact that such a small percentage of trained draftees reenlists in the service at the end of their tour of duty.

It is dismaying, too, to note the failure of the services to build up the numerical strength and training programs of the Reserves.

In addition, the apparent unwillingness of the military to recognize the importance and value, not only to the Nation, but to the States and local communities, of the National Guard is little short of astonishing. Failure to be guided by clear congressional mandate in these matters is most regrettable as well as inconsistent with the Constitution.

The American people want a strong, well-trained National Guard, and Congress must insist upon keeping up the strength of this great military organization. Likewise, Congress must keep up the strength of the Reserves.

I am not one of those who engage in unreasoning criticism of military leaders. To the contrary, I may say that I most highly appraise these men. I know of no group better qualified in their fields, more patriotic, more effectively devoted to their tasks, more sincerely dedicated than our military leaders.

However that may be, and as proud and grateful as we all are for their devotion and ability, the military was not intended by the Constitution to dominate this Government. It is the duty and function of Congress to provide for the common defense. We cannot escape, nor should we delegate, that responsibility.

The Nation is not at war, and we hope it will not be at war. We are not in a state of limited or unlimited national emergency. We are facing a great challenge to our free system which we must face with strongest determination to maintain an adequate defense and all-powerful striking force. Congress must unhesitatingly and expeditiously enact all legislation to that end.

But we cannot and should not in any circumstances legislate from a posture of hysteria, timidity, or uncertainty. It is not necessary to reshape or disrupt our social, educational and economic systems in order to set up an efficient, adequate national defense with well-trained personnel.

What we do here today will have great influence and bearing on our future strength and orientation. It will determine whether we have that awareness that will prompt us speedily and efficiently to adapt our military programs to the urgencies and inescapable demands of the space age, or whether in moments of complaisance and inertia, or mere stubborn adherence to 19th century concepts, we will continue to string along with programs that would be essentially better fitted to the philosophy and methods of Maginot line techniques than to the urgent, inexorable demands of the space century.

The very great American, the chairman of our esteemed Armed Services Committee, has the outstanding ability, patriotism, broad experience, able leadership, and dedicated zeal to cope with all these crucial problems.

While I respectfully differ with him and other Members on certain aspects of our manpower program, I am confident and hopeful that in this Congress we can, if we will, draw on our imaginativeness, knowledge, and boldness to attack space-age problems with space-age methods and space-age thinking and action.

Since I believe this is the best course for the Nation, I will adhere to it by voice and vote as long as I may be honored and privileged to be a Member of this greatest of all deliberative, democratic, representative bodies.

Mr. Chairman, let us courageously tackle the manpower and other problems of our military and defense system by looking forward and not backward. In war, we would immediately need the draft, so let us keep the selective system in full, standby efficiency to be ready for any eventuality.

But, in peacetime, and generally as a means of selecting and training young Americans for military service, it is a method completely outmoded. We should retain it only long enough to adopt a more realistic system.

Let us speedily adapt our defense and our Nation to the great new age in which we live. Let us make sure that our strength, military, economic and spiritual, is great and powerful in the realm of national defense and well-being.

Mr. RIVERS of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, yesterday, the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLMER], when he discussed the rule on this bill, stated that he was in favor of the legislation, but reluctantly.

I think he summarized in one sentence the feelings that all of us have with regard to the draft law. No one likes to vote for a draft law—just as no one likes to vote for a tax bill.

But when the security of the Nation is threatened as it has been, is now, and apparently evermore shall be, then we have no alternative but to meet our obligation to keep this Nation militarily strong.

The bill before the House today is a manpower bill, a bill dealing with the most precious item that the Nation possesses—manpower. By enacting this bill we indicate to the entire world our determination to remain strong. And I sincerely hope that we will not weaken this bill or attempt to sugar-coat it in any way by reducing the extension period from 4 years to 2 years. We extended the draft period for 4 years in 1955 because world conditicns were grave at that time. Certainly no one is so naive as to believe that world conditions have improved since that time.

We have passed laws to make a service career more attractive, but we know that there just are not enough volunteers in the Nation to meet our active duty military manpower requirements which exceed 2½ million men.

As much as we may personally hope for the end of the draft, let us not create false hopes or complacency in the American people by weakening this demonstration of a determined effort on our part to remain strong.

The world watches us today as we consider this extremely important measure. Whatever action we take will be noted not only in American newspapers, but within the walls of the Kremlin. They are looking for weakness—any sign of weakness. Let us not give them such a sign today.

Mr. ULLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that we should abolish the draft at this time. A critical manpower need exists and for the present at least, the draft is essential to the meeting of that real need. However, as with any continuing program, I believe it incumbent upon Congress to periodically reexamine the existing situation. A 2-year extension would insure a continuous supply of manpower for the immediate future and at the same time would allow time for a proper study of the problem to pave the way for a more workable and equitable program better designed to meet the future defense needs of our country.

I remain unconvinced that a blanket 4-year draft extension is essential. We have been told it has been done that way in the past with the implication that it consequently should be done that way in the future. I disagree. No arguments have been advanced on behalf of the 4-year draft that cannot be equally well met by a 2-year draft.

Confident that this shorter extension, coupled with a study commission, will maintain our defense needs, I voted for the amendment for a 2-year extension, but will support final passage because of my conviction that some extension is necessary at this time.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, as we are called upon to vote upon H.R. 2260, which will extend the draft for 4 more years, I find myself in the position of being dissatisfied with the operation of the draft in some respects and at the same time reluctantly concluding that voting against the bill is not the way to correct the matters to which I object. I have read the testimony before the committee word for word and all of the reports. I have very seriously considered voting against this bill and for that reason spent about 14 hours carefully reading every piece of material and chart available. The statistical matter confirms conversations and communications which I have had from persons in the district I represent, to the effect that the military has been reducing the number of Ready Reserves and in some instances refusing to take men into the Ready Reserves when at the same time they are drafting new men into service who do not want to leave their civilian pursuits. It seems inexcusable to me that someone who wants to serve and be a minuteman, is refused the opportunity to do so; at the same time someone else is refused the opportunity to stay out of the service. Another thing that I dislike is not having a program for selectees where they can take about 3 months of intensive training and return under a Reserve obligation to become a part of the Ready Reserve. Many of these boys have an extreme hardship when taken away for a 2-year period, but almost all of them could be away for a 3-month period and then come home and remain in the Ready Reserve without nearly so much sacrifice. The other reason I feel so strongly about this is that many of these young men that were drafted for a 2-year period have told me that only the first 3 months of their tour of duty was spent learning how to be a soldier. Too many of these who are inducted spend most of their 2-year period either doing nothing, or cooking, chauffeuring, or doing something unrelated to the defense of our country. I object to inducting young men for these kinds of jobs. There are civilians who would like to have a job cooking in Army camps and my experience has been that no matter how much experience young men have at cooking with military recipes, the food still is no better.

I am very much impressed, however, with the figure shown in the report which indicates that of the men who reach 26 years of age and therefore have graduated from the 8-year period during which they were liable under the Selective Service Act for military obligation, over 70 percent received military training of some kind and that 286,000 were inductees, 467,000 were volunteers, and 17,000 had entered the Reserves or National Guard. It is very clear to me from these figures that even if the military would keep everyone who wants to stay in the Ready Reserves and even if it did not waste men, it still would be unable to maintain the forces that the experts conclude we need. I was also informed upon questioning the gentlemen from Texas [Mr. KILDAY], a long-time member of the Armed Services Committee and regarded as an expert on personnel matters on the committee, that I am not alone in feeling that the Military Establishment has not done the best job that it could in all of these matters; however, it has been brought to my attention that when the appropriations for the military are brought before the Congress there is some opportunity to review these matters and Congress can make some qualifications in expenditures in the fields which may help in the situation. It is a very bad situation when we try to administer as well as legislate, but it is also recognized as a fact by many of us that too many of the military are not as imbued with the necessity of avoiding waste in the military as most of us are and if the administration is unwilling to do anything about it then there is no choice but for the Congress to do everything it can. I am voting for the 4-year extension of the draft but I am also going to go to work to do what I can to help reduce the number of selectees that are inducted to take the place of other young men who are refused the opportunity to be a member of the Ready Reserves. We must do this even if it requires placing qualifications on the appropriations for the military.

It seems to me that we must vote for an extension of the Military Training and Service Act today and then continue to do all that we can to alleviate the necessities for using it to the extent that it has been used in the past.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee will now rise.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SIKES, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 2260) to extend until July 1, 1963, the induction provisions of the Universal Military Training and Service Act; the provisions of the act of August 3, 1950, suspending personnel strengths of the Armed Forces; and the Dependents Assistance Act of 1950; pursuant to House Resolution 153, he reported the bill back to the House with an amendment adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

BOARD OF VISITORS TO THE U.S. COAST GUARD ACADEMY

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication, which was read by the Clerk:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, U.S.,
COMMITTEE ON MERCHANT MARINE AND FISHERIES,
Washington, D.C., January 31, 1959.

Hon. SAM RAYBURN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives,
U.S. Capitol Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Pursuant to section 194 of title 14 of the United States Code, I have appointed the following members of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries to serve as members of the Board of Visitors to the United States Coast Guard Academy for the year 1959: Hon. GEORGE P. MILLER, California; Hon. ALTON LENNON, North Carolina; and Hon. WILLIAM S. MAILLIARD, California.

As chairman of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, I am authorized to serve as an ex officio member of the Board.

Sincerely,

HERBERT C. BONNER,
Chairman.

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for this time in order to inquire of the majority leader as to the legislative program for next week. I think I might follow that request for information by suggesting that, of course, next week is Lincoln's birthday which is a matter of tremendous interest to many people on my side of the aisle. In addition, we are going to have a joint session here on Thursday which, I hope, will be attended by as many Members as can be here. With that statement, I would like the gentleman from Massachusetts to tell us what we may expect in the way of a legislative program next week.

Mr. McCORMACK. Recognizing that situation and also recognizing the fact that our Republican friends have special callings or responsibilities next week, I am happy to announce that there will be no business scheduled for next week.

Mr. HALLECK. I thank the gentleman. In other words, we will meet on Monday and go over to Thursday and then go over to the following Monday?

Mr. McCORMACK. We will meet on Monday, but do not hold me on the matter of going over to Thursday, although I expect that will be the situation. I do not want to be committed to that at this time. In the event that some Members have special orders on Wednesday, we would not want to deprive them of that. But that can be worked out on Monday. But, in any event, there will be no business scheduled and Members can govern themselves accordingly.

Except, of course, there is this one reservation—I know of nothing right now, but if anything goes through by unanimous consent they will only be minor matters which will be carefully screened. The Members know that anything that is passed by unanimous consent will be carefully screened by the leadership on both sides and by the ranking member of the committee affected.

Mr. HALLECK. I thank the majority leader for his consideration and cooperation.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALLECK. I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman tell me what is coming up 1 week from Monday? Has he any program for 1 week from Monday?

Mr. McCORMACK. I would say nothing 1 week from Monday. When I make a promise I keep it.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. That is true, I know.

Mr. McCORMACK. I do not want to make a promise, but I think the membership may reasonably govern themselves, that there will be nothing coming up a week from Monday. I do not want to be definitely committed to that, but I think the Members can act accordingly.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. The gentleman's word is his bond.

Mr. McCORMACK. I thank the gentlewoman.

IMMIGRATION OF EDUCATIONAL EXCHANGE PERSONNEL

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, this appears to be an appropriate time to explain to the House the policy of the Subcommittee on Immigration and Nationality of the Committee on the Judiciary in immigration cases involving aliens who entered this country under the international educational exchange program or—subsequent to entry—acquired the status of exchange students, exchange trainees, exchange professors, and so forth.

In my opinion, the exchange program is one of the finest manifestations of international cooperation and one of the most useful mutual assistance programs in which this country is engaged. It is an exchange of brainpower, if I may say so, exchange of experience in the technical know-how and in intellectual achievement, implementing most appropriately the military and economic mutual assistance undertakings.

The legal basis for the program is section 201 of the act of January 27, 1948, known as the Smith-Mundt Act, amended by section 402(f) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, the Walter-McCarran Act.

The law authorizes the Secretary of State to provide for interchanges on a reciprocal basis between the United States and other countries of students, trainees, teachers, guest instructors, professors and leaders in fields of specialized knowledge or skill. It further authorizes the Secretary of State to provide for orientation courses and other appropriate services for exchange personnel coming here from other countries and for Americans, or residents of this country, going abroad under the program. The law states further that the Secretary of State shall terminate or limit the educational exchange program with respect to a country which fails or refuses to cooperate in the program on the basis of reciprocity.

Conversely, the participating countries retain the right to terminate or modify the terms of their cooperation with the United States if we do not fulfill the requirements of reciprocal service.

Exchange personnel selected for the purposes of the program are admitted to the United States as nonimmigrants, pursuant to section 101(a)(15) of the Immigration and Nationality Act. For the purpose of easy identification of the terms of their admission, it has been administratively decided to mark their nonimmigrant visas with the symbol "EX."

Mr. Speaker, the international educational exchange program was not very long in operation when an increasing number of exchange personnel—most of them persons with impressive educational background and professional skills in many fields of human endeavor—have undertaken attempts to remain in the United States permanently. Their reluctance to depart from this country in accordance with the terms of their admission and their desire to settle in the United States were obviously prompted or stimulated by the fact that many American institutions of learning, hospitals, industrial corporations, laboratories, and so forth, became attracted to the highly skilled individuals and offered them permanent employment. Quite obviously, the opportunities offered by the prospective employers in the United States appeared much more interesting to the foreign physician, engineer, surgeon, mathematician, nurse, and so forth, as the salaries or other forms of remuneration looked more attractive than what she or he could expect in their own land. Also, some of the EX visitors developed family ties in this country through marriage to U.S. citizens, or to lawfully residing aliens, and not infrequently an exchange student would marry another exchange student whom he met in this country. The birth of children to these couples is similarly a not infrequent event.

Soon, private legislation appeared in the hoppers of the House and the Senate, seeking adjustment of immigrant status in cases of EX visitors where such adjustments were not feasible under administrative procedures.

The number of exchange visitors applying for permanent residence in the United States has markedly increased as the years went by, causing considerable concern first to the foreign governments who sent to the United States for education and training the cream of the crop of their youth, and then to our own Department of State where it was soon realized that to retain the exchange trainees in the United States after the completion of their education, would, of course, have the effect of nullifying the exchange program.

Consequently, in 1955, the Department of State recommended the enactment of a bill which would make it impossible for the exchange alien to remain in the United States without first departing from this country for a certain period of time and spending that time in his own country. Thus, before returning here, the trainee would be forced to give his own country and his own countrymen the benefit of the knowledge and experience which he acquired in this country.

In supporting this legislation, the Department of State stressed that the EX visitors who fail to return home negate the objectives of the exchange program in which the United States has invested a great deal of money and effort. The Department of State pointed out at that time that as many as 16 foreign countries indicated their intention to withdraw from the program if the United States continued to keep the best of the trainees for its own use, thus depriving the respective countries of their services and voiding all private and public efforts invested in the building up of that priceless capital which human brain and know-how represents in the modern world.

The bill recommended by the Department of State was introduced by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. JUDD] and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. It passed the House and the Senate and became Public Law 555 of the 84th Congress—the act of June 4, 1956. Briefly, it provides that a person admitted to the United States under the international exchange program is not eligible to obtain the status of an immigrant admitted for permanent residence until it is established that such person has resided and been continuously physically present in a cooperating country or countries for an aggregate period of at least 2 years following departure from the United States. The law provides for the granting of waivers from this obligatory 2 years' residence abroad, but such waivers may be granted by the Attorney General only upon the request of an interested agency of the United States Government and the recommendations of the Secretary of State if it is found that the granting of such waiver is in the public interest. This provision of the law has been somewhat extended through administrative interpretation so that on rather rare occasions waivers are granted in order to avoid extreme hardship which might be caused by the EX visitor's enforced departure from this country.

Both before and after the enactment of the act of June 4, 1956, the Committee on the Judiciary has not looked with favor upon private relief legislation affecting EX visitors. Its detrimental effect on the international educational exchange program was, of course, quite obvious to us. However, when in a particular case a very strong showing of equities was made to the committee, a Senate bill admitting an EX visitor for permanent residence passed the Senate and the House. On June 3, 1955, the President returned the bill, refusing to approve it and sending a veto message containing this paragraph:

> All of the exchange programs are founded upon good faith. We can maintain them as effective instruments for promoting international understanding and good will only if we insist that the participants honor their commitments to observe the conditions of the exchange in the same way that they expect the United States to honor its obligations to them. On the one hand, exchange aliens must return to the country from which they came. On the other hand, the United States must not permit either immediate reentry or other evasion of the return rule. Otherwise, the countries from which our exchange visitors come will realize little or no benefit from the training and experience received in the United States, and we shall fail to promote good will toward and better understanding of our way of life.

Soon after this veto message was received, three Senators served notice that in an effort to protect the international educational exchange program, they intend to object on the floor of the Senate to every private bill under which an EX visitor would obtain permanent residence in the United States.

Mr. Speaker, the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary which has jurisdiction over immigration legislation shares the views expressed by the President as well as the sentiments voiced in the Senate. My colleagues have authorized me to state that it remains our policy not to act favorably on private legislation of this type. I believe that it is my duty to inform my colleagues in the House that under this policy, private legislation affecting the immigrant status of exchange personnel will not be favorably reported to the parent committee. Consequently, the introduction of such legislation would seem not to serve a useful purpose.

Mr. Speaker, we have to bear in mind that all that existing statutes require is that the EX visitor spend not more than 2 years, in his own country preferably, or in another cooperating country, and that he thus comply with a simple moral obligation to have his countrymen benefit from the experience and education he acquired in the United States. Is not this a truly minimum requirement? And I am sure that compliance with this most sensible injunction could not possibly cause undue hardship to anyone.

It is important to bear in mind that the various American institutions, firms, corporations, and even individuals who desire to secure the services of the skilled alien for themselves, would not be deprived of this benefit for more than approximately 2 years. The enactment of the so-called Walter-McCarran Act, with its section 203(a), under which first preference is granted to highly skilled individuals whose services are needed in the United States, made the admission of the highly skilled alien much easier than was the case under the law previously in effect. In order to facilitate the return of the EX visitor upon his compliance with the 2 years' foreign residence requirements, any American institution of learning, a hospital, a laboratory, even a private firm or an individual, could file with the nearest office of the Immigration and Naturalization Service an application Form I–129, under which such alien, and the members of his immediate family, are granted first preference status under the immigration quota to which they are chargeable. There is every reason to believe that such first preference immigrant visas will be available for the alien so classified and for his spouse and children, if any, by the time he is eligible to return to the United States for permanent residence. Upon making an entry for permanent residence, he will be eligible for naturalization after complying with the other requirements of title III of the Immigration and Nationality Act.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that I have to add to this explanation one note of warning to the EX visitors. I am informed by the Departments of State and Justice that a considerable number of EX visitors file applications for a waiver of the 2 years' foreign residence requirements of Public Law 555 of the 84th Congress not only on the ground that their services are needed in the United States but on the ground that they married United States citizens and on many occasions had even a child, or children, born in the United States.

As I said before, very few administrative waivers are granted and here again the Committee on the Judiciary agrees with the policy of the Department of State refusing to recognize that hardship would ensue in the event that the American spouse, with or without children, would have to spend 2 years abroad or that there will be a relatively short period of separation involved. The warning I wish to give to all concerned is that under existing regulations, the filing of an application for a waiver under Public Law 555 of the 84th Congress automatically terminates the applicant's exchange visitor's status in this country, inasmuch as he obviously states his intention to remain in the United States permanently and therefore cannot be regarded any more as a bona fide EX visitor. It is most important therefore that a great deal of thought be given by everyone before such application is filed.

I hope that my colleagues in the House will readily recognize and share our motives in dealing with the exchange personnel's immigration problems. We simply refuse to contribute to the breakdown of a most useful program which would continue to bring us important moral and material profits only if our investment in it is well protected.

ABUSE OF THE PASSPORT PRIVILEGE

Mr. SELDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. SELDEN. Mr. Speaker, I call to the attention of the House an attack on the United States made by an American Communist at the 21st Russian Communist Party Congress.

On February 2, James Jackson, secretary of the Communist Party of the United States, told the Soviet Congress:

> If President Eisenhower could also say, as Nikita Khrushchev did in his report, that in the United States there is not a single political prisoner, then many leaders of the Communist and workers movement of the United States would be able to be present here and to greet the delegates of the Congress.

Mr. Speaker, no one stands more strongly for free speech than I do. I think our system is so strong that it can withstand any oral brickbats thrown at it. I believe our diplomacy is effective enough so that we can take in our stride spoken criticism of our foreign policy by American Communists who travel abroad.

But I point out to the House that this American, Jackson, addressed a Soviet body—the Soviet Communist Party Congress—that supposedly sets Soviet Communist Party, and hence Soviet Government, policies. In 1933 the Soviet Government was recognized on the basis of formal agreement by its Foreign Minister that there would be no Moscow directed, or assisted, Communist activity in the United States.

Yet here is an American Communist—James Jackson—who has the insolence publicly to report in Moscow that the American Communist Party "takes part in the daily fight to improve workers."

How did this American speaker to the Soviet Party Congress get to Moscow? James Jackson traveled on a valid United States passport. He was thus entitled to the aid of American officials overseas and to good treatment by foreign governments. Our Secretary of State was unable, as the result of two Supreme Court decisions handed down last June, to deny a passport to Jackson and consequently to keep him from wrapping himself in the protection of the American flag.

Does any Member of this House favor giving a passport to a man so that he can attack the United States before a foreign policymaking body? Does any Member of the Congress favor letting American Communists travel abroad who serve the Soviet Union as espionage agents, couriers, or saboteurs?

Civil liberties are not involved here. Neither are the rights of ordinary American citizens who hold and expound unorthodox beliefs. Subversion is involved. Our officials are compelled today to give passports not only to the Jacksons but to Americans who have acted as Communist couriers and to Americans who have played a part in the theft of our secrets.

No other government does this. We properly do things in the field of human liberty that most other governments do not. But not things that are plainly idiotic. No responsible government assists those who would destroy it, particularly a government with a democratic and equitable system which protects human liberties under a system of law.

James Jackson did not tell the Soviet meeting how many American Communists have seized upon the legal protection of the fifth amendment. He did not say that anyone who is in jail in the United States is there by due legal process. He did not say that many Communists are at liberty because of this process. That would not serve the Soviet purpose.

In addition to Jackson, other persons with known records of Communist affiliations have received passports since last June when the Supreme Court of the United States held that the Secretary of State, under existing law, has no authority to deny passports to members of the Communist Party. Also, I have been informed that a deluge of people with records of Communist affiliations have applied for passports since the Supreme Court's decisions of June last and that applications are still flowing in.

The President of the United States made it clear in a special message to Congress last July that quick action is necessary to protect us from this danger. The following month, the House of Representatives adopted, without a dissenting vote, a measure that would give the Secretary of State, subject to administrative and judicial review, the necessary authority to deny passports to members of the Communist Party. Due to the last minute adjournment rush, this legislation was not considered by the United States Senate.

I have introduced a measure (H.R. 55) dealing with this matter, which is identical to the bill that was passed by the House of Representatives last August. I trust that early action will be taken on this legislation in both the House and the Senate in order to close a serious breach in our defenses.

SOCIAL SECURITY AT AGE 60

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I am speaking to you today in support of my bill, H.R. 1955, to make full social security insurance benefits available to men and women at age 60.

In doing so, I am urging Congress to take a hard and realistic look at our social-security legislation, and to determine whether it has not perhaps become obsolete in view of today's needs.

This is not a bill to condemn our older citizens to statutory senility at age 60. It is a bill to enable them to look toward their later years with some degree of confidence, to take some of the terrible anxiety out of the aging process.

The fact is that many workers are being forced into retirement, usually against their will, long before they reach age 65. The present social security age requirement makes no allowance for this problem. Social-security insurance beneficiaries must wait until they are 65 to receive payments, even though they have actually had to retire several years before. I say they "had to retire" advisedly, because this is what has happened in most cases. Statistics will bear me out on this. The Social Security Administration made a survey in 1951, which resulted in this important finding: Only about 5 percent of the beneficiaries retired voluntarily while in good health to enjoy their leisure. The rest had lost or quit their jobs for reasons largely beyond their control. More than half the retired workers receiving old-age insurance benefits quit their jobs, but the overwhelming majority of these did so because of poor health. Persons who quit for health reasons, added to those who were forced to retire because they had lost their jobs, brought to more than four-fifths the proportion of beneficiaries who had been forced into retirement.

Consider the plight of the older worker who finds himself on today's job market. There is a lot of pious talk, in government and outside, about how much these people can still contribute to our productivity. This is unquestionably true. Many of our people at age 60 are completely free of the infirmities of age and illness, and most others are still capable of performing some useful work. But try to convince the employer of this. The Federal Government is trying to make some headway in behalf of the older jobseeker, an effort I heartily endorse. There is no question, however, that increasing age is still accompanied by an insurmountable barrier of discrimination. Many employers simply refuse to hire men and women who are approaching old age, or even those who are in their active middle years.

Let us look at some statistics, released by the Department of Labor in 1956 after a seven-area survey of the older worker in the labor market. This report showed that while workers 45 years of age and over comprised 40 percent of the jobseekers in the seven areas, they obtained only 22 percent of the jobs filled by employers during the year under study. Both men and women encountered similar difficulties. Men of 45 or older, representing more than two-fifths of all male jobseekers, received less than one-fourth of all the jobs filled by men. Women in the same age group comprised one-third of the female unemployed, and received only about one-sixth of the openings given to women.

This discrimination can come as no surprise to anyone. It is only necessary to glance through the classified ads of any of our newspapers, to find that age restrictions are listed openly by many employers.

Even when facing job discrimination, many older workers continue somehow to earn a decent living. The average age at which men actually leave their jobs and apply for benefits is over 68, although social security benefits can be collected at age 65. The people we need to think about now are those who, because of advancing years, are not able to find work at all, or who can find only part-time, temporary, or low-paying work which does not assure them of even a subsistence income. These people can and will continue to work whenever possible. But when part-time employment fails to bring in enough, or bad times lead to unemployment, or infirmity destroys their earning power, they should be able to look somewhere for assistance.

There is no need to make them charity cases—an expensive, demoralizing, unimaginative, and totally unsatisfactory solution to the problem. Certainly most of our older workers, who have known the dignity that comes with being self-supporting, do not care to be thrust suddenly into a position of complete dependence on outside support. It makes much more sense to allow them to draw upon their share of social security insurance benefits, to which they have contributed, at a time when they need them.

We are becoming increasingly aware of the need to solve some of our most pressing social problems. We are taking steps to provide inexpensive housing for those who need it, as well as adequate medical care. But for a large group of people who are under age 65, and who are facing compulsory retirement, we are doing very little, indeed. It is fine to tell them that they can look forward to some degree of security when they reach the magical age of 65. It seems to me, however, that this promise is worth very little when the years before must be ones of destitution and privation.

If we sincerely hope to solve some of our society's greatest ills, we cannot afford to approach them haphazardly. A patchwork job, which fails to provide for great areas of need, must be corrected. There is no question in my own mind that a measure lowering the retirement age to 60 would be a major step in developing a sensible and comprehensive social security program.

What I am urging is not new to you. Many others, including myself, have previously endorsed legislation along these very same lines. But no positive steps have been taken, and the suffering of our older citizens has continued to mount. I think time is running out. Generous thoughts must give way to action. There may have been a time when we could afford to procrastinate, but in view of the rapidly expanding number of older people in our country, this is no longer possible. What we have today is an aging, largely urban population, struggling to survive the dislocations and complexities resulting from a growing, expanding economy. If we are to save our older men and women from disease and despair, we must help them in this struggle. And we must help them now.

ONE HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE FOUNDING OF LANSING, MICH.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. Speaker, in 1959, the city of Lansing, Mich., commemorates its 100th anniversary.

In a young country like the United States, a 100th anniversary is an important milestone in the history of any city.

But the centennial of a capital city of one of America's greatest industrial States has particular significance. It is a reminder of how the industry of our country has in such a short time brought the United States into world leadership.

It is a time not only for the city to be proud, but for the State and the country to be proud. It is even a time for them all to boast and brag a little of what Lansing's accomplishments mean in the State, National, and world picture.

We are highlighting these achievements in Michigan's capital with a 4-month centennial celebration beginning with the dedication ceremonies on February 16, and I would be delighted to have any of my colleagues attend these programs as my guest.

Climaxing the events to be staged in conjunction with the centennial program during the month of May will be a century of music, a history of transportation parade, and a transportation and industrial show, and in June an outdoor historical spectacular. Before these highlighted events will be others equally as significant, including a centennial fashion show, tree planting, ball, antique show, and many other special events.

The Post Office Department has given a special cancellation to the city of Lansing to be used during the centennial. As the Congressman who proudly represents the Sixth District of Michigan which includes the city of Lansing, I am introducing a bill to provide for the issuance of a special postage stamp to commemorate the city's 100th anniversary.

I trust that my colleagues will support this legislation, and that the members of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee will give it their early and favorable consideration.

SOVIET MILITARY AUTHORITIES IN GERMANY

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, for 2 days earlier this week the Soviet military authorities in Germany, in a flagrant violation of all legal or moral rights, held up a U.S. Army convoy at Marienborn checkpoint inside East Germany.

This convoy, on its way from free Berlin to West Germany, was traveling on the Autobahn to which our military vehicles are supposed to have free access. The convoy was delayed because the Soviets insisted on the right to inspect the cargo, a right they have never had.

It is clear to all of us, Mr. Speaker, that this was another effort of the Communists to throw the Western World off its guard and to weaken our position in any forthcoming talks on the Berlin and German situations.

We in the West are becoming accustomed to the tactics of threat and blackmail which the Bolshevists have always used to accomplish their ends. We know that we must withstand such pressures with iron nerves and unflinching determination.

Our diplomats and top military leaders, well experienced in dealing with Communist threats and pressures, know how to react to such situations. But I would like to draw the attention of the House today to the one individual in this week's crisis who had to bear, most directly, the tremendous Communist pressure.

That individual was Cpl. Richard C. Masiero, of West Stockbridge, Mass., one of my constituents. As the man in charge of the covoy held at Marienborn, Corporal Masiero had a tremendous responsibility. He was under the strictest orders to show the Soviet officials the manifest orders, but not to let them inspect the cargo. He had to see to it that these orders were scrupulously carried out. He had to be polite but firm with the Red army officials, taking care not to make any chance remarks which might cause a serious incident. It is clear that Corporal Masiero, as he and his men waited for many long hours before their release, was in an extremely delicate position, a position requiring the utmost in courage, patience and careful behavior.

Corporal Masiero discharged his responsibilities in the very finest manner, bringing credit on himself, his family and the U.S. Army. I am personally acquainted with this young man, and I had the greatest confidence that he would successfully handle himself in that precarious situation.

We are all tremendously relieved, Mr. Speaker, that this convoy has been released. But I think that all of us must look with the utmost concern on what is happening in Germany. The present interference with American convoys recalls the same tactics, employed by the Soviets before they imposed the blockade in 1948.

In the months ahead our country and the other Western allies are going to be subjected to tremendous pressure to relinquish our rights of free access to Berlin. The Soviets, through tactics of alternating threat and cajolery, will try to make us abandon our position in free Berlin. We will be threatened with atomic war if we resist, and offered the sugar pill of a U.N.-supervised free city of West Berlin if we acquiesce.

The purpose of these Soviet maneuvers is clear. Once the Western allies have been ousted from Berlin, the Soviets will be in a position to take over that city and incorporate it in their puppet state of East Germany. If they succeed in this venture, the 2,200,000 inhabitants of West Berlin will lose their freedom and be consigned to Communist tyranny. The firm anti-Communist stand of West Germany will be weakened, and the entire North Atlantic Treaty Organization will be undermined—perhaps fatally. The Communists will have won a decisive victory in the cold war.

Mr. Speaker, I have the feeling that our entire Nation is facing this impending crisis with little appreciation of the trying times which lie ahead. Our national mettle may be tried to the utmost.

What we must hope for in the months ahead is that all of us will demonstrate the same courage, calmness, and resolve so well demonstrated by Corporal Masiero and his men at the isolated checkpoint in East Germany earlier this week.

DISASTROUS AIRPLANE CRASH

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. Speaker, I have just finished sending notes of sympathy to the families of three of my constituents who lost their lives in the disastrous crash day before yesterday of an American Airlines plane at the LaGuardia Airport. The names of the victims are: Edward N. Benjamin, 1155 Park Avenue, John A Hermann, 955 Park Avenue, and Peter Kefalas, 215 West 34th Street—all of New York City.

The tragedy and heartbreak of this event are unspeakable. One of those killed was Edward N. Benjamin, known to me chiefly by reputation as a young lawyer, a member of a leading law firm, and a promising leader of the community. To his widow and his children, and to the families of John Hermann and Peter Kefalas, go the sympathy of the entire community.

The rest of the country has suffered indescribable losses in the same manner.

I am aware and appreciative of the record of American Airlines for safety. Nevertheless, I deem it the responsibility of the Congress to see to it that the examination of the crash, the circumstances, and the reasons are fully and publicly explored.

INTER-AMERICAN RELATIONSHIPS

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SIKES] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. SIKES. Mr. Speaker, we are living in a period of history when economic vision is needed as never before. The age-old concept of national self-sufficiency is out-of-date. Our modern needs are so all-comprehensive that we must have close ties with the countries in the whole world, especially countries in our own hemisphere. Our progress and safety in the Western World can only be found in genuine partnership by combining our resources and sharing them for better living in many fields.

One outstanding feature of our Western Hemisphere relations concerns the enlightened longrun self-interest which our countries have usually demonstrated in their international relationships. Never before have we in the Western Hemisphere had such a growing opportunity for consolidating our hemispheric solidarity by applying a greater concept of interdependence to our economic relationships.

Mr. Speaker, on August 20, 1958, I expressed my full support for an Inter-American Bank before this great body. At that time I was concerned over the apparent lack of active support being shown by the United States for this institution. However, I am glad to say that today the establishment of an Inter-American Bank is more than an idea without concrete proposals.

Since the mid-thirties there have been demands for an institution of this kind which would assist in promoting the economic development and the economic cooperation of the Latin American countries. The Latin American countries are our next door neighbors, and I feel they are ready to accept their responsibility in a cooperative effort for solidarity of purpose among the Americas.

In the past the United States has refused financial support for the proposal. Recently, the policy of nonsupport has changed and we now find that the United States is presently engaged in negotiations with our Latin American neighbors looking toward the establishment of such an institution which would, in the words of the President, "facilitate the flow of public and private capital for economic development projects in this hemisphere and would supplement existing lending arrangements." Inasmuch as these negotiations are now in progress I would not like to prejudice the position of the U.S. negotiators or inhibit our Latin American friends from putting forth specific proposals of their own by making detailed proposals of my own. I do feel, however, that it is both timely and appropriate for me to point out certain aspects of such an institution which I hope will be fully explored in the creation of the proposed bank. I also feel that the American people must be kept aware of developments along these lines and that they be assured the new lending institution will not be just another segment of the foreign-aid program, but that it will be founded on Democratic principles with all of the Latin American countries making appreciable contributions to its capital and that they take an important role in the management of its operations. In the study I have made of the proposal and our policies, I am glad to say that I see a great future for the Inter-American Bank. This contemplates a future not dependent upon the sacrifices of the people of the United States, but a future based on sound principles of business principles through the cooperative efforts of the peoples of the Americas.

During the negotiations which are currently under way, it is my hope that all delegates will bear in mind that the paramount purpose of an inter-American Bank should be to support the economic development of Latin America. There are existing institutions which have, of course, contributed importantly to this function. The International Bank for Reconstruction and Development has assisted Latin America as one part of its total task of assisting the reconstruction and development of countries all over the world. On the national scale the Export-Import Bank has directed much activity toward facilitating investment in Latin America where that investment is directly associated with the export of U.S. goods and services.

The desirability of the new institution in the eyes of our neighbors is that it will concentrate specifically on the problems of Latin America. While the stage of economic development in Latin America varies substantially from country to country, the development problems of the area have many features in common. All the nations in Latin America have passed the earliest stages of industrialization; some of them have attained a high degree of industrialization, though usually in a relatively limited range of goods.

The Latin American countries are unique among the less developed countries of the world. They have a common heritage and have shown a real desire for mutual cooperation in achieving further economic progress. The proposed bank must be built upon this acceptance of the principles of mutual cooperation. With all the member countries' contribution to the capital of the institution and sharing the responsibilities as lender and borrower, I am confident a new sense of continental and hemispheric solidarity will be stimulated.

I believe the new insitution must be differentiated from existing institutions as well in the sense that the provision of technical advice and assistance must play a more important role in the operations of the new bank. As you will recall Dr. Milton Eisenhower and many others have suggested that investment in certain countries of Latin America has lagged because investment proposals presented to existing institutions have shown inadequate preparation. The proposals lacked studies and analyses required to reach a sound judgment relative to the feasibility of the proposed operation. I am referring to the type of study which examines the availability and the cost of raw materials to be used in a given process and the availability and source of necessary power—the type of study which contains an analysis of the potential market and includes forecasts of probable costs and selling prices. Studies of this nature were frequently not available simply because skilled personnel were not readily accessible to the potential borrower. This is an area in which I hope the proposed Inter-American Bank will make a substantial contribution. Such technical assistance will open many opportunities for sound investments which will not only return a profit to the bank or to the private investor undertaking the project, but will contribute in an important way to broadening the base for further industrial and agricultural growth in many areas of Central and South America.

It should be clearly understood by all concerned that the new institution is not intended to supplant any existing lending agency in this field. However, the new institution must seek the full cooperation of these agencies in performing its functions. Perhaps even more important, it should seek to stimulate the flow of private investment capital into Latin America. Latin America enjoys an extremely favorably position from the standpoint of the American private investor. Thirty percent of the total U.S. private investment throughout the world is located in Latin America, and in 1957 alone the value of these investments increased by $1,658 millions.

The new institution will have a vast opportunity to stimulate private capital flow into the Latin American countries. In its early years of operation it should by identifying and removing certain bottlenecks open up profitable opportunities for the employment of private capital. It should also assist in the preparation of sound investment projects and perhaps add its guarantee to sound projects in order to give the private investor greater assurance that his capital will be wisely used.

In considering the many functions of the proposed new bank, consideration should be given to those countries which do not appear to have the capacity to repay foreign loans in a fully convertible currency. I believe, however, those countries might acquire that capacity in the future if they are given access to capital resources and apply them wisely. For this reason, I would favor combining in this institution the power of making loans which would be repayable in the currency of the borrower—referred to as soft loans. Soft loans should be a subordinate part of the total operations of the bank and must necessarily be handled in a manner to prevent any impairment of the value of the institution's assets. Funds for this operation should be kept separate from resources available for hard loan operations with all countries participating contributing to the resources for both operations. With such participation, the institution will be truly inter-American.

There have been many differing views about how large this institution should be. To me, the size of the institution is secondary. The important thing is to establish the institution and put into operation an effective organization for inter-American cooperation. We have witnessed in the past a weakening of relationships with Latin American countries. The proposed Inter-American Bank can be a contributing force to restoring close contact and cooperation among and with our neighbors.

I wish to draw attention to another Latin American problem that has been somewhat overlooked—namely a rise of productivity commensurate with population growth. The population of Latin America today is approximately equal to that of the United States. Her annual increase of 2.5 percent will give her a population well in excess of that of the United States by the year 2000. The needs of this phenomenally growing population is not being met currently by its own production and certainly the needs of the population by the year 2000 will not be met unless its rate of productivity is stepped up. We have noted what remarkable results have been obtained from our investments, but the sad fact remains that even if our investment were to be doubled, the increase in productivity will not be commensurate with the growth of the population nor able to supply their basic needs for consumer goods. If our investments are to achieve the purpose envisioned for them, we must provide the growing Latin American population with a rising per capita real product.

The establishment of the Inter-American Bank which I have consistently supported and the increased private investments which can be expected, together with the present assistance programs and institutions will add great momentum to the economic development of the Latin American countries. If this institution is to be a success, it must seek to inspire the confidence of the private investment community in the United States and in other capital countries. It must also inspire the confidence and cooperation of existing institutions working in the same field. And, it must never overlook the fact that it was established for the purpose of promoting inter-American development and cooperation.

Mr. Speaker, I am most encouraged with the progress made toward establishing the Inter-American Bank since my statement in August of last year. While much work remains to be done, I feel we are now approaching the time when such an institution will be a reality. I hope my distinguished colleagues will join with me in urging the early approval of this important institution—important to the economical development of our neighbors, and important to the mutual understanding and cooperation of all the countries of the Americas.

BUDGET BALANCERS VERSUS BUDGET BUSTERS

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MACK] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. MACK of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include certain tables prepared by the Library of Congress and myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. MACK of Washington. Mr. Speaker, President Eisenhower has proposed a $77 billion balanced budget for the coming year.

I note in the newspapers that some of the President's balanced budget opposition calls this $77 billion balanced budget unrealistic, inadequate, and unattainable. Some budget busters even have denounced it as a pennypinching and a cheapskate budget.

How times have changed. When President Woodrow Wilson proposed the Nation's first billion dollar peacetime budget his was called an extravagant and a spendthrift budget. Now, 40 years later, when President Dwight Eisenhower submits a $77 billion balanced budget it is called a pennypinching and a cheapskate budget.

Unfortunately, too many political spenders in recent years have come to consider a billion or a few billion dollars as a mere bagatelle, as small change and as chicken feed. Seemingly, spenders sometimes forget that every dollar expended by the Federal Government must be raised by taxes and that every one of those tax dollars must be earned by sweat and toil in factories and on farms, in mines and forests, and in offices, warehouses, stores, and workshops. Tax dollars do not grow on trees.

How much is a billion dollars? How much is $77 billion?

A billion dollars is a sum so enormous and gigantic that it is beyond the comprehension and understanding of any man—even an Einstein. Perhaps the average man can better evaluate how much a billion dollars or $77 billions really are by reducing the figures to a per capita basis.

To properly appreciate the magnitude of present-day Federal spending, the average citizen should ask himself "How much is a $77 billion budget going to cost me and cost my family?"

The latest Federal census estimates place the population of the United States at about 176 million. A billion dollars divided among that many people, therefore, represents $5.75 for every man, woman, and child in the Nation. President Eisenhower's balanced budget of $77 billions is 77 times $5.75 or $442 per capita or about $1,768 for every average American family of four persons.

I asked the research department of the Library of Congress how much the President's $77 billion budget amounts to per capita. The Library replied, $442.49 which, I think, because of its source, can be taken as near an official and reliable figure of the budget's per capita cost as is obtainable.

For the Federal Government to collect in taxes just enough to keep the $77 billion budget in balance means an average cost per capita of $442. To provide its share of that tax money the people of a town of 1,000 must dig up next year $442,000 in Federal taxes. The people of a city of 10,000 must make an annual contribution in Federal taxes of $4,420,000, and those of a city of 25,000 population must supply $11,050,000 a year in Federal taxes or almost $1 million a month just to keep the budget balanced.

To call the $77 billion balanced budget a cheapskate or a pennypinching budget is to call the average family whose share of the cost of that $77 billion budget is $1,768 a year a cheapskate family. I do not believe the citizen is going to like that label pinned on him. Mr. Average Citizen, I think, is going to reply that $77 billion is a big enough budget for next year and that Congress ought to find a way to live within it. The average citizen, I am sure, feels that the $77 billion spending proposed by the President should be the maximum for the coming year.

No individual and no business man can continually year after year spend more than his income without ultimately encountering financial disaster. The same principal applies to government.

WHAT EACH STATE MUST PAY

I asked the Library of Congress to inform me how much the citizens of each State must pay, on a per capita basis, to provide the taxes to pay for the $77 billion of spending contemplated by the President's budget.

The Library statistics reveal that of the 49 States that 27 must contribute in Federal taxes next year more than $1 billion each.

New York State's share of the $77 billion budget will be more than $7 billion and California's share more than $6 billion.

The share of the 2,767,900 people of my own State of Washington of the $77 billion just to keep the proposed budget in balance will be $1,225,255,000.

The following table prepared for me by the Library of Congress, shows the cost in taxes of the $77 billion budget to each of the 49 States.

I am inserting in the RECORD the amount of money which will be required from each State in order to balance this budget. It is interesting to note that 28 of the States will have to contribute just to get the budget balanced more than a billion dollars each in taxes: New York State $7 billion; California, more than $6 billion, and my own State of Washington in excess of $1 billion.

I am also inserting in the RECORD the figures showing the cost to each of the 9 counties in my congressional district, the cost for the 332,000 people of the balanced budget which will be $147 million.

I am also inserting the names of the cities and towns in my district and the per capita share of that $77 billion.

Then I will further in my statement enumerate the hidden taxes that are being collected from the people in order to balance the budget.

When the individuals consider that it means $442 for every man, woman, and child in the United States, when they consider the cost to their towns of this budget, I think they will say that they want the budget balanced rather than the budget busted.

SOME FEDERAL TAXES NOT IN BUDGET

The $77 billion in the President's balanced budget, which amounts to $442.49 per capita for the Nation's 176 million inhabitants, does not include all the Federal taxes the citizen will be required to pay to keep tax income equal to Federal spending.

The 3-cents-a-gallon tax the citizen pays on gasoline and the 15 cents a pound he pays on tires are items not included in the anticipated income required to balance the budget. The gasoline and tire tax revenue goes into a special trust fund. This fund finances the Nation's highway program.

Nor are social security withholding taxes, paid in part by employees and in part by employers, included in the anticipated revenue required to finance the $77 billion budget. These social security taxes also go into a special trust fund from which social security benefits are paid.

MOST TAXES ARE HIDDEN

Few citizens realize the amount of Federal tax they pay. Many of the largest sources of revenue are in hidden taxes.

The Federal tax on cigarettes is 8 cents a package. The smoker who consumes one package of cigarettes a day in a year pays $29.20 for the privilege of smoking. If his wife also smokes a package a day, the man and wife in a year pay $58.20 in hidden taxes on cigarettes. The smoker does not realize the cost in taxes of smoking because he does not see this tax.

The manufacturer of cigarettes writes the checks to the Federal Government to pay this tax, but the manufacturer collects every cent of that tax from the cigarette smoker at 8 cents a package every time a package of cigarettes is purchased. Federal revenues from the cigarette tax last year totaled $1,668,208,000.

Large corporations are said to pay 52 percent of their profits to the Federal Government in corporation income taxes. But, just as the tobacco manufacturer pays no cigarette tax but merely collects it from the consumer and passes this tax money over to the Federal Government so most corporations merely add corporation income taxes to the price of the goods they sell. The consumers, not the corporation, therefore, pay the corporate income taxes. Most corporations do not pay income taxes. They merely collect these taxes as the cigarette manufacturer does the excise tax on cigarettes, and pass the taxes so collected over to the Federal Government. The corporation income taxes consumers paid, last year, hidden in the purchase price of goods they purchased amount to $20,533,316,000.

Also, all excise taxes on jewelry, cosmetics, automobiles, furs and other items are paid not by the manufacturer, but by the consumer with the producer merely acting as the Government's agent in collecting these taxes.

INFLATION TAXES CONSUMERS

One of the heaviest of unseen taxes that the average citizen pays but seldom analyzes or sees are the taxes caused by inflation—the rising cost of living. This in reality is a capital levy tax that confiscates the reserves the average citizen has laid aside for old age or a rainy day in his bank deposits, his savings and loan accounts, in his insurance policy or in the money he has invested in bonds, government or private.

As an example, let us consider the unseen tax that inflation has levied on those who invested billions of their savings in Government bonds.

A citizen in 1939 invested $75 in a Government bond. In 1949 he could receive $100 for this bond. If he kept his $100 in that bond for another 10 years it would bring him by 1959 in interest and principal a total of $133, less of course his income tax on the $58 in interest he received for the 20 years investment. Seems as if the bond buyer did pretty well on his investment by obtaining $133 for his $75 investment. But did he?

In 1939 a 1-pound loaf of white bread was 8 cents and his $75 that went into a bond would have bought him 937 loaves of bread. Now, however, in 1959 the same loaf of white bread is 19 cents. The $133 he receives for his bond will purchase only 700 loaves of bread. Inflation has robbed Mr. Average Citizen bond buyer of 237 loaves of bread.

In 1939 milk was 12 cents a quart. In that year a $75 U.S. bond would purchase 625 quarts of milk. In 1959 milk is 29 cents a quart and the $133 the average citizen obtains for this $75 investment in a Government bond buys only 459 quarts of milk or 166 less than the $75 would have purchased in 1939.

Leg of lamb was 28 cents a pound in 1939 and is 77 cents a pound today. The $75 invested in a Government bond in 1939 would have purchased 270 pounds of leg of lamb, but at the present-day price of 77 cents the $133 that Mr. Average Citizen now can obtain for his $75 bond is only 173 pounds. The hidden taxes of inflation have taken 97 pounds of meat from his table.

Coffee in 1939 was 22 cents a pound and in 1959 is 70 cents. The $75 invested in a bond in 1939 would have purchased 341 pounds of coffee. Today, the $133 obtained for that bond will buy only 190 pounds of coffee.

If the budget is not balanced the people face either more taxes or more deficits, neither of which are pleasant to contemplate. An unbalanced budget means a bigger and bigger national debt, and the bigger that debt the more inflation there will be to rob the savers of the purchasing power of their savings.

The only way to halt inflation is to balance the budget and give assurance the budget will stay balanced. Balancing the budget is the responsibility of Congress for "Congress controls the purse strings."

Most citizens will prefer to join the President and be a budget balancer rather than a budget buster.

SOME AMERICAN GOALS FOR MIDDLE EUROPE THAT ARE IN TUNE WITH OUR TRADITIONS

The SPEAKER. Under the previous order of the House the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. REUSS] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Speaker, Secretary of State Dulles is off to Western Europe, reportedly to see whether we and our Western allies cannot react to the ticking time-bomb of Berlin with some fresh insights and new ideas for a settlement of the problems of Berlin, Germany and, indeed, middle Europe. Many of us on this side of the aisle, who for some time have been calling for bold new approaches in our foreign policy, will welcome any attempt to open the windows and let in fresh air. We want Mr. Dulles to know that if he will get on with the job of ventilation, he can look for much support from the loyal opposition.

It is timely and necessary that the West develop a policy for middle Europe. The Russian military occupation of Eastern Europe is cruel to the human beings who are tyrannized and dangerous to the world. And, to look out from Russian eyes, it was from middle Europe that twice in this century came appalling wars of the world.

Neither side has been particularly willing to consider the position of the other. For all that appears, Western policy is that Russian troops should withdraw back to Russia, whereupon a reunited Germany and a set of liberated captive states should be free to arm to the teeth, to ally themselves militarily with the West, and to glare at Russia with all the hostility of other days.

Russia's policy, on the other hand, has been to bring under its domination, and under communism, lands as far to the west as possible, stopping only where the danger of atomic war appears imminent.

Most recently, on November 27, 1958, came the Russian ultimatum that in May it will assign its authority over East Berlin to the East German government. Coupled with this is the implied threat that the Russians will support with force of arms an East German attempt to swallow West Berlin by cutting off western access to it.

Oh, there have been occasional departures, mostly verbal, from these frozen positions. Bulganin, after the Budapest massacre of 1956, talked about mutual troop withdrawals; Rapacki, of Poland, recently threw out a proposal for a nuclear free zone, accompanied by some reductions in conventional troops; Khrushchev told the 21st Soviet Communist Party Conference last week that he would be willing to withdraw Russian troops from a long list of countries, including Hungary, in a Central European disengagement. And on our side, we had Anthony Eden's plan for a demilitarized zone in middle Europe at Geneva in 1955; Harold Macmillan's recent proposal for a NATO vacuum in the east half of a reunited Germany; and just the other day Secretary Dulles' talk about the need to give thought to Russia's legitimate security interests, and the idea that free elections in a reunited Germany could come somewhat later than as a first step in a middle European settlement.

These little wisps of air are not enough. The Russian people may not know or care where their leaders are taking them, but the American people have a long and respectable tradition of liking to know where they are going in the world. They like their Presidents to sketch out the broad goals at which our foreign policy is aiming, and they like their Congressmen to debate these goals.

It is for this reason, Mr. Speaker, that I suggest today, as I have in this place many times before, that there are certain elements in the American tradition from which we can evolve broad goals for American policy in Middle Europe. For the last century at least, the United States has pursued a policy of peace. Its wars have been wars of national survival, or at least to help free others from foreign tyranny. With some lamentable exceptions, we have stood for human rights and free institutions abroad as well as at home. We have been happily tending to submerge excessive nationalism and to look more toward international cooperation. Above all, and particularly since the splitting of the atom, we have come to recognize that it is part of America's destiny to do what we can to prevent the world from going up in smoke.

The man on the street, Mr. Speaker—yes; and the mother in her kitchen, the student in school, the worker in the factory, the businessman in his office, the farmer in his field—feels in his bones these elements of the American tradition. It should be the task of our leadership to apply these underlying principles to the problem of Middle Europe in such a way as to evolve a set of goals for the American people to mull over.

Consistent with our immediate position of preventing the seizure of West Berlin by the Communists, and of maintaining the NATO alliance, are not the following some reasonable goals of a policy for Middle Europe?

MILITARY

A start toward world disarmament could be made by a partial disarmament in the dangerous area of Middle Europe. This would involve:

First. A troop withdrawal on Russia's side as far as possible, hopefully to her historic borders; on the West's side, by British, French, and U.S. troops from their present positions, probably out of Western Germany, but in any event, only so far as not to place our side at a disadvantage in the light of the Russian withdrawal.

Second. Self-imposed arms limitations by the Middle European states, including a reunited Germany, that emerge when foreign troops are withdrawn. Such limitations would permit forces sufficient for internal policing, and to prevent being a pushover for outside aggression, but would not be attuned for aggressive war. Atomic, biological, and chemical weapons, and missiles, would be eligible for the Middle European prohibited list, as a first step toward wider disarmament. International ground and air inspections, preferably under the United Nations, would be required.

Third. Guarantees from NATO and the Soviet Union, respectively, to resist aggression against, from, or between the countries of Middle Europe.

POLITICAL

The only way in which East and West Germany can become fully reunited, in the ultimate, is by free elections, perhaps supervised initially by the United Nations. But such free elections need not be the first chronological step in a Middle European settlement; before that, for example, a freeing up of exchanges of persons and goods between East and West Germany could take place. While it is probably not realistic to think about internationally guaranteed free elections for the countries of Middle Europe other than a reunited Germany, the removal of Russian soldiery would be a great step forward toward respect for the rights of man and of the citizen.

ECONOMIC

Just as the history of Middle Europe was marred in the period between World War I and World War II by excessive militarism and political totalitarianism, so it was by economic nationalism. A settlement, therefore, should have as its goal the same kind of political federation and economic integration which this country has wisely espoused in Western Europe in the last decade. This deemphasis of nationalism could be the best way of achieving settlements for such knotty territorial problems as the trans-Oder Neisse question. For example, the German claim on these territories might well be relinquished if the attributes of Polish nationalism were removed from the area by arrangements for economic, cultural, and political internationalism.

What would be the advantages to the West of such a military, political and economic settlement for Middle Europe? First and foremost, 80 millions of human beings now under the shadow of the Red army would be freed. Secondly, an area essential to whatever plans of world domination the Kremlin may have would be removed from its control. Thirdly, by placing several hundred miles between Russian and NATO troops, such a settlement would considerably reduce the daily threat of war. I do not suggest that such a settlement would deserve the name of "disengagement," because the main antagonisms between Communist Russia and the West would still remain and need to be dealt with. But each point of hostile contact that can be removed, as in the Austrian peace treaty or the Lacey-

Zaroubin agreement for cultural exchange, seems to me a net gain.

If these are the advantages of a settlement, what are some of the alleged disadvantages of the settlement? And are the disadvantages real?

First. "It would mean the end of NATO." The short answer is that it would mean nothing of the kind. NATO's strategic retaliatory power would be unimpaired. To the extent that it is deemed necessary, American ground forces could continue in Europe. There is surely lodgment for our five divisions in Europe other than in the precise positions they now occupy. Under a genuine settlement, membership in NATO by Germany, reunited but willing to accept arms limitations internationally imposed, would not be a vital matter.

Second. "A reunited Germany is too power-conscious to be successfully neutralized, like Switzerland, Austria, or even Sweden." This confuses arms limitations for a reunited Germany with across-the-board political, cultural, economic, or social neutralization, none of which is desirable or even possible. Let a reunited Germany involve herself in peaceful relationships with the West even more fully than has the present West Germany. This includes the Coal-Steel Community, the Council of Europe, Euratom, the Common Market, and organs of integration as yet undreamed of. At the same time, let Germany look toward the East for a similar set of intimate nonmilitary relationships. And, best of all, let a reunited and partially demilitarized Germany taste what William James called "the moral equivalent of war" by taking the lead in peaceful international aid for the emerging peoples of Asia, Africa, the Middle East, and Latin America.

Third: "Germany, without Western troops stationed on her soil, might turn to Russia." This evokes memories of the Rapallo Agreement after World War I in which Germany reached out toward the East, and of the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact, under which Russia and Germany in 1939 agreed to carve up Poland. If Germany wants to orient herself toward Russia, there is nothing to stop her from doing so under the present circumstances. In the long run, the best guarantee against German defection from the West is for free institutions to flourish in Germany, divided or reunited.

Fourth. "German membership in NATO, and involvement with Western troops, is a guarantee against the rebirth of German aggressiveness." A line of argument similar to this was made by President Eisenhower at a recent press conference. If German aggressiveness is a danger to be considered, I suggest that a reunited Germany, without atomic weapons and with limitations on other arms, is a safer bet than a Germany armed with atomic weapons, missiles, and whatever else may be in store for a rearmed Western Germany.

Fifth. "The Russians might break their promise and fail to withdraw their troops." Indeed, so they might. But if they did, the West could cease its troop withdrawal then and there.

Sixth. "The Russians, after completing their withdrawal, might choose to reenter middle Europe." Russia is only going to withdraw her troops from the present captive states if she is prepared to sit still for a change in government in those states, so long as it is not a change to a government which can become militarily hostile to Russia. If, then, Russia withdraws her troops, it seems absurd that she would be doing so with the idea of shortly sending them to fight their way back. In any event, to advance the possibility of Russian reentry into middle Europe as reason for not making efforts to get her to withdraw her troops in the first place is to acquiesce in a perpetual Russian occupation.

Seventh. "The Russians, freed of middle Europe, might turn their attentions to Asia, Africa, and the Middle East." In fact, they are turning their attention to underdeveloped areas now, with considerable embarrassment to this country. If the great struggle to be won in Asia, Africa, and the Middle East is—as I believe it to be—one of lifting up the living standards and the hopes of emerging peoples, the West should not be disturbed by the prospect of Russia's bearing part of this burden. Indeed, American taxpayers should be quite pleased by it.

So I submit that the disadvantages of these proposals for a middle European settlement are either chimerical, or are outweighed by their advantages.

The next question is: What can we do about it? Here I must admit that some unfreezing needs to occur on both sides.

On the side of the West, none of the four Governments of the United States, Great Britain, France, or West Germany have been willing to espouse the general ideas inherent in these proposals. Except for a few Republicans like former Senator FLANDERS, of Vermont, their proponents have been largely Democrats—Senator FULBRIGHT, Senator HUMPHREY, some of us in this body. In Great Britain, except for an occasional Tory like Lord St. Oswald, the proponents have been largely members of the Labor Party—Hugh Gaitskell, Harold Wilson, Dennis Healey. In West Germany, except for a few members of the Christian Democratic Union, the proponents have been largely of the Social Democratic Party—Berlin's Mayor Willy Brandt Fritz Erler, and others. The present official French position tends to follow the official German position.

On the side of Russia, her official position has never been openly tested. To the extent that Russia is hell-bent on world conquest, and having the countries of Middle Europe to loot, of course, she will not be interested in a genuine settlement. But a sensible and patriotic Russian, free of megalomaniac fantasies, should be able to see in the proposal much of true advantage to his country. It would reduce the threat of atomic war; it would remove Russia from a precarious position in her satellites; it would provide real assurance against heavily armed and hostile neighboring states; it could open up great new trading areas; and it could allow the diversion to peaceful purposes of resources now used for the military.

I can think of no better way to bring into power in Russia a sensible and patriotic Russian than for the West to place before the bar of world opinion goals like those I have advanced. If Russia rejects them, let her tell the world why.

Mr. Speaker, I have often, in the past, applied to Mr. Dulles' travels the wartime canon: Is this trip really necessary? Here is assuredly one that is.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REUSS. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. The gentleman will recall that the present administration has frequently said that it must seize the initiative. Can the gentleman recall when the administration has reflected this kind of initiative in recent months or recent years?

Mr. REUSS. Certainly not in recent years. I recall an exciting and inspiring speech made by President Eisenhower back in April 1953, in the fourth month of his office, in which he held out hope to the people of the world, hope for peace and hope for peaceful development, and there was a tremendous response to that.

I have been disappointed, as many others have, that recently there has not been this willingness to seize the wonderful possibilities for leadership that have been thrust upon us for constructive and forward-looking purposes. However, I am optimistic by nature, and I am very hopeful that as a result of the current trip of Mr. Dulles and as a result of the negotiations which must come in its wake, there will be evolved a foreign policy for the West, thoroughly agreed in by the governments and the people of Western Germany and Great Britain and France and this country, and our other good friends and allies of the West, so that we can stand for something in Western Europe and Middle Europe and Eastern Europe which is in accord with the principles of justice. If we do that, I think we will be in a splendid moral position.

I think the unhappy necessity which many of us were faced with today in voting on an extension of the draft, and I have just gotten through voting in favor of it myself, though reluctantly, may one day disappear if we will evolve programs which, while they prepare us for the worst, also hold out some hope of better things.

So I say to the gentleman that our record in recent years has been not one of imagination, not of creativity. I know that I speak for the gentleman as well as for myself when I express the hope that these things, too, will pass and that there will come an American position in which Americans of all creeds and classes and races and political parties can join.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I think it is very valuable that a Member of this House should be proposing and espousing such constructive alternatives. I, too, have listened to the very fine speeches the administration has made during the 6 years it has been charged with carrying out its foreign policies, but I agree with the gentleman when I recall a phrase which my mother used to use. She said, "What you do speaks so loudly I cannot hear what you say."

What has depressed me and what has caused some of my friends this afternoon to feel so critical of the administration with respect to its military policy is that it frequently seems so devoid of a constructive and creative foreign policy. I trust the words which the gentleman from Wisconsin has spoken will be noted favorably and will help to influence the administration in a constructive way. Certainly if there is to be a realization of the hopes which were first set forth in the Atlantic Charter to reduce the crushing burden of arms it must come first of all by the relief of tensions which have made necessary the extension of the draft which was voted here this afternoon. I hope that in the months ahead if not in the years ahead, but in the months ahead, we shall see further evidences of this kind of creative policy on the part of the administration, not merely on the part of this House.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REUSS. I yield.

Mr. HALLECK. I have listened with considerable interest to what the gentleman has said. Of course, there are many problems confronting the country. I just listened to the gentleman's observations concerning the foreign policy of this country over the last 6 years. I had not intended to say anything. The time is late and there are very few Members here. But I cannot refrain from saying that when President Eisenhower took over the Presidency of this country and his administration came to power we were at war. That war has been ended. There have been no new wars since that time in spite of the fact that there were many opportunities for this country to get into war. In those 6 years the defensive strength of this country has been built up stronger than it has ever been before. We have brought a war to an end and we have kept it with honor. What better test of a foreign policy can there be? I just wanted the record to show that at this point.

Mr. REUSS. I thank the gentleman. I wish he could have refrained from saying that because the effort on this side was to try to be constructive and to try to show that new ideas and new leads by the Republican administration and by the Secretary of State would get support from this side, and, as the gentleman knows, I am ready to support those whenever they are forthcoming.

Mr. HALLECK. I appreciate that but will not the gentleman agree with me that the remarks just made when he yielded to his colleagues heretofore were certainly critical of the administration and its foreign policy and its defensive posture?

Mr. REUSS. Well, I do not know that it is profitable to agree or to disagree. I recall saying a moment ago that the President in 1953 threw out some creative and constructive new ideas in foreign policy which I thought had had a great effect throughout the world to enhance the position of the United States. I regret that there has not been more of them. If that is criticism I know that the gentleman will, and has, made the most of it.

THE SOCIAL SECURITY EARNINGS LIMITATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. STEED). Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LEVERING], is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. LEVERING. Mr. Speaker, I have today put into the House hopper a bill to amend title II of the Social Security Act to remove the existing limitation upon the amount of outside income which an individual may earn while receiving benefits under the act.

During my campaign for election to Congress, I promised my constituents that, if elected, I would introduce such legislation and would do everything in my poor power to see that the social security law is changed. I found this to be a popular issue, Mr. Speaker, because many, many individuals in my district are wage and salary earners, as well as farmers, and they feel keenly that they should not be penalized, upon reaching retirement age, by having to make reports upon what little outside earnings they may garner by part-time work.

This is an important bill not only to hundreds of thousands of persons who already are retired and are enmeshed in social security redtape because they must supplement their social security receipts by working at other jobs, but it will be important in the future to millions who are yet to retire.

Senator J. W. FULBRIGHT, Democrat, of Arkansas, the new distinguished chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, who recently introduced a bill similar to mine, declared:

> It is my view that this limitation is unrealistic and absurd and should be removed by Congress.

I share that view exactly.

As we know, the retirement eligibility age for women who are covered by social security is 62, if they so choose, and for men the retirement age is 65. Under the law as it now stands, if a person earns more than $100 in any one month, he is penalized to the extent that he must pay back the money that social security brought to him in that month.

Notice that I used the word "earn." It is a glaring weakness in the law, and in my judgment a great injustice, that a person may collect in dividends an unlimited amount each month, or each year, and still collect his social security. In other words, if a person is a millionaire, and does not need social security, he is virtually forced to take it and is not penalized in any way because of any fictitious or involved earning limitation. The same is true if the person owns a business from which he might take unlimited profits. Yet, this same man could get his full social security payments each month and not have to go through the rigamarole of making a report of it to the social security office.

This provision of the law must cost millions of dollars a year, altogether, merely to administer, for clerical assistants, paid by Uncle Sam, must answer questions from hundreds of thousands of persons a year who may be affected by this obscure regulation. I know that it is about as discriminatory a law against the people of moderate means as you could imagine, for the only people who are affected by it are people who—forced by need—must supplement their meager social security allowance by working extra, either part time or full time.

There are some who say that we should not remove the limitation entirely, but that the limitation should be $2,000 a year, or $3,000 a year, or some other specific sum. Yet, these same advocates would put no ceiling at all on the earnings which a man may receive from his investments, or from a business he might own, to prevent him from getting his full share of social security payments. If there is to be no limitation for this or that group in the society, Mr. Speaker, I would like to know how, in all justice and fairness, we can put a limitation on any group, or individual, in relation to the money he is to be paid by social security? In simple equity and justice, I cannot see the point of those who merely want to raise the limitation. My legislation, if enacted, would remove this sore spot from the social security law once and for all.

It is verifiable, Mr. Speaker, that while some poor woman over the retirement age is being penalized because she earned slightly more than the limit as a scrubwoman in Chicago, or some other city, the widows of millionaires, living in Palm Beach or elsewhere, collecting stock dividends running into the thousands of dollars a month—or week—are eligible to receive, and do receive, their full social security payments. The contradiction of this—and similar examples—should spur us into action to do away with this discriminatory and unfair earnings limitation at the earliest possible moment.

Why should there be any limits on the earnings of an elderly person who is collecting his social-security payments and yet still wants to make a contribution to this society? I can understand why, 20 and 30 years ago, when full employment was not a set objective of the Federal Government, men and women might have been encouraged to retire. But today, at a time when this Nation needs the production—the goods and services—of everyone, and when it is our declared national policy to keep employment at a maximum, there is something anomalous—yes; ridiculous—about putting a ceiling on the earnings of workers collecting social security, while not putting any restraints whatsoever on millionaires, and those who are rich but may not be millionaires, and how much they can collect from rentals, dividends, interest, or otherwise.

I am not, you understand, objecting to the fact that there is no limit to what a rich man—off his savings—can earn and remain eligible to receive his social-security payments. This is his right. But I object strenuously, in the name of every elderly person who has been penalized by this provision of the social-security law, or those who may be penalized in the future, against retaining this part of the law on the statute books.

It is not good morals. It is not good economics. And it is not good sense, as I deeply believe that anyone who will think it through will agree.

USE OF ALCOHOL IN MOTOR FUELS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the previous order of the House the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. JENSEN] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a grain alcohol bill, just as I did during the last two sessions of Congress, which provides that all motor fuel shall after 18 months from date of passage, contain 5 percent alcohol made from surplus farm commodities.

Senator KARL MUNDT, of South Dakota, has done likewise, and I am informed that other Congressmen will during this session introduce companion bills, because they, like a great majority of our farmers and other citizens, have now come to the full realization that there is no other way that can be devised to reduce our tremendous, costly, price-depressing farm surpluses, or at least without putting our farmers in a Federal straitjacket.

The present farm program which has been altered and realtered year after year has long ago proven its ineffectiveness in reducing surpluses, so detrimental to a prosperous agriculture over the long pull. It has piled surplus upon surplus to the tune of over $8 billion at the present time, which might be tolerated if good results were in sight.

It has been of little benefit to the family sized farmer, and has reflected to the detriment of many small town merchants irrespective of the millions poured into most every county to pay the farmers for not raising certain crops, forcing millions of farmers to fertilize to the hilt in order to raise enough cash crops on their reduced acres to pay for ever higher and higher manufactured goods, operating costs and higher and higher taxes, and while grain prices were being forced down and down.

Oh, yes; livestock prices have during the past 2 years been pretty good, but I ask what will happen when meat production catches up with consumption, and that time is almost here?

Now let us take a look back for the purpose of seeing why we have had this farm problem with us these many years.

Before the advent of the iron horse, trucks, tractors, autos, and many other modern gasoline burning devices, our flesh and bone horses and mules ate the production of over 43 million acres of our land. Please compare that amount of acres with the acres we have been trying by law to take out of production with a farm program, most of which is still in effect today. There is one effective solution, and only one solution to the farm program which will stabilize our farm income on a higher level, and in turn our national economy, and that is by making law the bill we have introduced.

Please remember always that our farmers buy on an average over twice as many dollars' worth of manufactured goods—costly trucks, tractors, farm machinery, lumber, posts, wire, and so forth—when his dollar is worth 100 cents at the counter, year after year, than does the average other Americans. So, it is plain to see that labor and business benefit proportionately over the years according to the ability of our farmers to buy.

Following is the full text of our bill:

A bill to amend title II of the Agricultural Act of 1956 so as to provide for the utilization of surplus agricultural products through the use in motor fuels of alcohol manufactured from agricultural products grown on farms in the United States

"USE IN MOTOR FUELS OF ALCOHOL MANUFACTURED FROM AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

"SEC. 213. (a) As used in this section—

"(1) The term 'agricultural product' means any agricultural product grown on farms within the United States.

"(2) The term 'motor fuel' means any petroleum product (including gasoline, kerosene, naphtha, benzine, and crude oil) which (A) has a specific gravity of thirty-six degrees or above, Baumé scale, and (B) is suitable for use as fuel in an internal-combustion engine.

"(3) The term 'United States' means the various States of the United States, the Territory of Hawaii, and the District of Columbia.

"(b)(1) Beginning six months after the effective date of this section, it shall be unlawful for any person to sell motor fuel in interstate or foreign commerce unless at least 2 per centum, by volume, of such motor fuel is alcohol manufactured from agricultural products.

"(2) Beginning eighteen months after the effective date of this section, it shall be unlawful for any person to sell motor fuel in interstate or foreign commerce unless at least 5 per centum, by volume, of such motor fuel is alcohol manufactured from agricultural products.

"(3) Any person violating the provisions of paragraph (1) or (2) of this subsection shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both. Each sale of motor fuel in violation of paragraph (1) or (2) of this subsection shall constitute a separate offense.

"(c) Subsection (b) of this section shall not apply to sales of motor fuel during any period prescribed in a proclamation by the President declaring that, for purposes of this section, agricultural products from which alcohol is produced are not in surplus.

"(d) This section shall take effect on the first day of the first month which begins more than ten days after the date of its enactment."

Now let us see what the effect of this bill would be if made law. I shall be as brief, positive and as accurate as I possibly can by using facts and figures obtained from interested Federal agencies and from other responsible sources.

A 5-percent alcohol mix in all motor fuel would consume annually at the present rate of motor-fuel consumption over 700 million bushels of grain.

The feed value of the mash after alcohol has been extracted is about 40 percent of the original grain, hence our grain surpluses would be reduced over 400 million bushels annually after sufficient plants get into operation, which is estimated to take a period of 18 months.

The Commodity Credit Corporation has now about 2 billion bushels of corn and wheat in storage. We are told that we should have about 400 million bushels of wheat and 400 million bushels of corn in our ever-normal granary at all times to insure a plentiful supply in case of a severe reduced production caused by drought, and to use in the event of any national emergency. Hence we now have about 1,200 million bushels of these grains in surplus supply, which is costing hundreds of millions of dollars to store annually in addition to the first cost, and which is depressing all grain prices; and will in due time bring all livestock prices down in line with grain prices, because the law of supply and demand will always operate to a very marked degree regardless of any artificial controls or laws enacted by the Congress of the United States so long as our free enterprise system is permitted to operate.

If the time should ever come when supply and demand is stopped from operating, our American liberties under the free, private enterprise system, will be no more, for then some form of dictatorship will be our lot. And let us never forget that farming is yet the greatest of all free private enterprises in our land.

Under the provisions of our bill it is plain for all to see, who want to see, that its enactment into law would immediately begin to stabilize farm income on a higher level, reduce the price-depressing, costly surpluses to nil in a few years, and yet keep our grain surpluses on a safe, ever-normal granary level.

During World War II a number of grain alcohol distilling plants were built by the Government to produce artificial rubber and other materials for our military needs, but immediately after that war ended these plants were shut down, or disposed of, and during that time we learned that commercial alcohol could be produced economically. We learned that from a bushel of low-grade soft wheat 2½ gallons of alcohol could be processed, and that today, from a bushel of low-grade corn, costing the processor $1.25 per bushel, grain alcohol, or agrol as it is called, can be manufactured for 45 cents per gallon after selling the residue for stock feed. Alcohol from wheat would cost a little more per gallon, because of the first cost being a little more.

Now I am quite sure the processor could make a good profit by selling his agrol to the retail dealers for 65 cents per gallon, and I am also quite sure the retail dealers would be glad to sell it for 80 cents per gallon.

A 5 percent agrol mix would mean one-twentieth part of such motor fuel, and one-twentieth of 80 cents is 4 cents. And we know by experience that regular gasoline mixed with alcohol gives you equal or more miles per gallon than does straight high grade gasoline, which costs from 3 to 5 cents more than regular gasoline. Every racing car, every racing speed boat, and every jet plane uses an alcohol mix in their motor fuel now. Many nations have laws requiring that all motor fuel contain alcohol made from farm crops. Few did so, however, to reduce crop surpluses, but because of the high cost of gasoline there, primarily due to a shortage of gasoline. Brazil is an exception. A number of years ago Brazil had a great oversupply of sugar, hence sugar prices, one of their main crops, was causing a greatly distressed agricultural and in turn a depressed national economy; what did they do? They passed a federal law which provided that all motor fuel must contain at least a 10-percent mix of alcohol made from their surplus supply of sugar, and it had the immediate effect of not only making their farmers much more prosperous, but also it had the overall effect of helping to stabilize their entire economy. And that is how unrest in Brazil was brought to nil and is yet thus.

Now you may ask, What are we waiting for?—and justly so. Here is the answer in a few words. I will go back to 1935 when six Members of the House and Senate introduced identical bills as Senator MUNDT's and mine, with the exception that their bills provided for a 10-percent agrol mix in all motor fuel. But lo and behold, then, as now, a number of the large oil and gas producers of our Nation, because of selfish reasons, brought concerted pressures on Members of Congress from oil-producing States, who even at that early date were powerful enough in the Halls of Congress to not let such a bill out of committee, and to this day such a bill has not been voted out of committee; and hence to the floor of either House for a vote by the representatives of the people. For example, during the last session of Congress I asked one of the top members of the House Agriculture Committee in charge of such bills, who is from the State of Texas, if Senator MUNDT and I could be heard on our bill before his committee. He said "Sure," but he boldly told me to my face that he would have to oppose the bill because a lot of oil is produced in his State. Those were his exact words. My question was, How long will those people keep their heads in the sand? Then in 1958, to add insult to injury, the two chemists, or so-called mineral engineers, who were loaned to the President's Commission by their employers of huge oil-producing interests, to look into and recommend new industrial uses for farm products, wrote in the Commission's report to Congress, in short, that a 5-percent agrol mix in motor fuel would operate to the detriment of motor fuel; which is pure hogwash. And that a 10-percent mix would consume annually about 2 billion bushels of grain, which was more than we would be justified in using for that purpose.

Now I ask, How long will Congress and the American people take this kind of business from selfish interests, who should know that we are all in the same boat with our farmers in any economic storm, and that finally all will suffer or gain almost equally, one with the other? Time is rapidly running out for us to save ourselves from the same fate that has befallen every nation of this world that refused to heed the danger signals ahead.

Should our bill become law you would soon see agrol distilling plants spring up in many, many sections of our country, especially in the breadbasket of America, financed by private investors, and by farm-owned corporations, giving employment to thousands upon thousands of folks who are now seeking employment. Especially would such plants be a godsend to many of our farmers and their sons who have time in the off seasons from fieldwork to take employment close to home, and who want to stay on their family-sized farms.

In conclusion we invite every Member of Congress who is interested in stabilizing our farm economy on a higher level, and in turn our national economy, to introduce and support a like bill as Senator MUNDT and I have introduced, and which I have just explained in some detail. We hope that thoughtful people everywhere will think seriously and, after doing so, will come to the aid of their country by letting their U.S. Representatives and Senators know exactly their position on this important, proposed legislation.

GERMAN COAL EMBARGO

Mr. DOWNING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOWNING. Mr. Speaker, the Bonn Government proposes to admit a certain tonnage of American-produced coal free of tariff after February 16 of this year. When the free quota is exhausted, West Germany has served notice that a tariff of $4.76 per ton of American coal will be charged.

I have protested the unfairness of this situation to our Secretary of State and in the press. This is not a one-man crusade. Other Members of this House have lodged like protests. Protests have come from union leaders, mine operators, railroad presidents, men in charge of dock facilities, and from shipowners.

If the German market should be closed to American coal—and it would be if the Bonn Government persists in its unfortunate course—thousands of Americans would be thrown out of work.

It is my hope and prayer that the Bonn Government will understand our plight and reverse itself. It can—with honor.

In the event that West Germany stands firm, it should be wise to prepare counteraction. This country has been flooded with imports of small German cars. These automobiles seriously compete with, and impede the sales of, American cars.

Mr. Speaker, after much thought on this subject, I suggest that the proper committee of this House study the possibility of legislation which would raise the existing tariff on German-made automobiles.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Floods Again Plague Indiana

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. EDWARD ROUSH

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 5, 1959

Mr. ROUSH. Mr. Speaker, I represent an area of the great State of Indiana which abounds in rich farmland, in great industrial potential, and people who are reasonable and proud. We do not make unreasonable demands upon our Government and whenever possible prefer handling our own problems. However, when we are in a position where the magnitude of our problem reaches beyond our own resources and abilities we do not hesitate to seek the help which only our Federal Government can give. We have such a problem now. Indiana has been plagued with floods for many years. Floods which have cost our people millions of dollars in flood damage. Floods which have swept away some of our richest farmland, floods which have destroyed property, floods which disturbed the economy and well-being of our people.

Last year our President signed into law a bill authorizing the construction of three reservoirs in the upper Wabash River Valley. This authorizing legislation was wise. It was not a hit-and-miss thing. It was an acceptance of the recommendations of agencies of authority who had spent years studying our problem. "At last," we thought, "we have made progress. We now have relief for our problem." Not so. Although recognition was readily given to the fact that we have a need in Indiana for flood control, this need was ignored when it came to supplying necessary funds for the final planning of these projects. The Presidents' budget ignored our request for $50,000 for the planning of the Salamonie River Reservoir and $150,000 for the Mississinewa River project.

Mr. Speaker, Indiana should not be denied the protection the construction of these projects will afford to the lives, property, and well-being of our people. At this very moment floods are sweeping away our topsoil, destroying our property, and endangering the lives of our citizens.

It is difficult for us Hoosiers to understand why we have been deprived of funds which would alleviate one of our most pressing problems.

H.R. 1012, Liberalizing the Railroad Retirement and Railroad Unemployment Insurance Acts, Should Be Approved Immediately

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

Thursday, February 5, 1959

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I appeared before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in support of proposed amendments to the Railroad Retirement and Railroad Unemployment Insurance Acts, including my own bills, H.R. 1370 and H.R. 1373.

My statement follows:

STATEMENT OF REPRESENTATIVE JAMES E. VAN ZANDT, 20TH DISTRICT OF PENNSYLVANIA, BEFORE THE HOUSE INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE COMMITTEE, FEBRUARY 3, 1959, IN SUPPORT OF AMENDMENTS TO THE RAILROAD RETIREMENT AND RAILROAD UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACTS

Mr Chairman, I deeply appreciate the opportunity to appear before you and the members of this committee in support of bills I have introduced to amend the Railroad Retirement and the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Acts.

The legislation has been introduced by me in previous Congresses and has the support of many individuals and groups among the railroad population of my congressional district in Pennsylvania and of the Nation.

The bills are as follows: H.R. 970 provides retirement on full annuity at age 60 or after serving 30 years, and further provides that such annuity shall be not less than one-half of the individual's average monthly compensation for the 5 years of highest earnings, and so forth.

H.R. 971 provides that an annuitant be permitted to continue to perform compensated service for the outside employer by whom he was last employed before his annuity began to accrue. H.R. 971 covers the situation where an employee about to retire is required to resign a clerical position with a church, civic, fraternal, or social organization.

H.R. 972 repeals the prohibition against the payment of both earned social security benefits and spouse benefits under the Railroad Retirement Act. At the present time a spouse entitled to earned social security benefits is penalized by deductions from the amount payable as spouse benefits under the Railroad Retirement Act.

H.R. 1374 is a bill to provide a 20-percent increase in all widows' annuities. In this connection, the 1956 amendments to the Railroad Retirement Act granting an increase of approximately 10 percent did not include all persons receiving retirement benefits, with the result many widows were denied the increase.

Mr. Chairman, H.R. 1370 and H.R. 1373 represent my version of the Harris bill, H.R. 1012, with H.R. 1370 providing for an across-the-board increase of 10 percent in railroad retirement benefits and H.R. 1373 amending the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act by providing an increase from 130 to 195 the maximum number of days of unemployment within a year for which unemployment benefits may be paid. The bill also liberalizes other provisions of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act and is identical to those provisions of the Harris bill, H.R. 1012, that affect the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act.

I want to go on record at this point of expressing my support of H.R. 1012 because I think it is a step in the right direction in recognizing the urgent need for amending the Railroad Retirement and Railroad Unemployment Insurance Acts. I should like to comment on H.R. 1012 and mention briefly some of its principal provisions.

1. A 10-percent increase of all monthly benefits effective January 1, 1958.

2. Female employees with less than 30 years of service or the spouse of a retired employee will be able to obtain retirement benefits at age 62 on a reduced annuity. This option is already in effect under the social security system.

3. Maximum creditable compensation for determining benefits and earnings subject to taxation would be increased from $350 to $400 a month for the purpose of broadening the tax base to secure the additional revenue needed to pay the cost of the proposed amendments and to liquidate almost entirely the present actuarial deficit in the railroad retirement fund of $213 million.

4. With the taxable base of earnings broadened to $400 a month or $4,800 annually, the tax rate on employers and employees will increase January 1, 1959, from 6¼ to 6¾ percent. On January 1, 1962, the tax will increase to 7¼ percent each.

In the field of railroad unemployment insurance benefits, H.R. 1012 would provide:

1. An increase in daily benefit rates of 50 cents to $1.70 a day higher than present rates.

2. A new schedule of rates ranging from a minimum daily benefit of $4.50 for annual compensation of $500 to $699.99 to a maximum benefit rate of $10.20 for annual compensation of $4,000 or more.

3. Unemployment benefit periods would be extended for employees with 10 or more years' service by 65 to 130 days, depending upon length of service beyond the 130-day maximum provided in the present law.

4. To finance the cost of additional benefits and to take care of the current deficiency, the tax base after 1958 would be increased from $350 to $400 and the tax rate would be increased so that it would range from a minimum of 1½ percent to a maximum of 3½ percent contingent upon the balance in the railroad unemployment insurance account. Minimum annual earnings needed to qualify for benefits would be increased from the present $400 to $500.

Mr. Chairman, as we all know, the 2d session of the 85th Congress increased social security benefits 7 percent effective January 1, 1959. In addition, for those unemployed whose insurance benefits terminated during 1958, an extension of 13 weeks was granted them.

Therefore, should H.R. 1012 become a law, the 10-percent increase in railroad retirement benefits provided for would become effective January 1, 1959, and for those unemployed railroaders whose unemployment insurance benefits terminated in June 1958, they would be eligible for benefits from 65 to 130 additional days, dependent upon length of service.

The bill actually gives to retired and unemployed railroaders the same treatment accorded persons retired under the Social Security Act or unemployed under the State unemployment compensation laws.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to dwell briefly on the situation facing retired and unemployed railroaders in my congressional district.

First, from a population standpoint I represent one of the largest railroad districts in the Nation. Therefore, I know the full impact of the cost of living on retired railroaders as well as the hardships of unemployment that exist in the railroad industry.

As an example of unemployment conditions in the railroad industry and the urgent need of extending the benefits period for railroad unemployment insurance benefits, I wish to call attention to the fact that in the 3 counties comprising my congressional district a total of 2,101 employees have already exhausted their eligibility for railroad unemployment insurance benefits.

At the present time 1,048 employees are receiving unemployment insurance benefits, and, of this number, 861 will exhaust their right before the new benefit year begins on July 1, 1959. At that time it is estimated by the Railroad Retirement Board that a total of 1,681 employees in my congressional district will be unable to qualify for railroad unemployment insurance benefits in the new benefit year because they did not earn sufficient wages during the calendar year 1958 to qualify for such benefits.

Mr. Chairman, in reviewing my efforts during my congressional career to give adequate service to constituents affected by the Railroad Retirement and Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, I have been greatly aided by the members and employees of the Railroad Retirement Board not only at the Chicago headquarters but also at district and regional offices in Altoona, Pa., and Cleveland, Ohio, as well as the liaison representative assigned to the Washington office of the Railroad Retirement Board.

In December of last year I visited the headquarters office of the Railroad Retirement Board in Chicago to discuss with the chief executive officer cases of my constituents that came under the provisions of the Railroad Retirement and Railroad Unemployment Insurance Acts, and also to obtain an evaluation of the actuarial condition of the railroad retirement fund and the effect on the fund of legislation that has been suggested to me for introduction in this Congress.

While in Chicago, I also met with members of the Board and some of the staff. I was not only impressed by the way the information I requested was readily made available to me, but I was also impressed by the keen sense of interest and responsibility those Government employees had in administering the provisions of both acts and their consciousness of the existing inflationary trend.

The Board is also well aware of the economic changes that are going on in the railroad industry and of the possible effect of such changes on operations of the Railroad Retirement Board. With this in mind, they are continually reviewing operations to keep expenses at a productive minimum.

I learned that even before the request of the Bureau of the Budget was received requesting that a 2 percent reduction be made in personnel expenditures for 1959, steps had been taken to hold employment levels well below budget limitations so that there was no problem in adhering to the request.

It was pointed out to me that although the retirement load of the Board has increased greatly since the inception of that program in 1937 and will continue to increase for some years in the future, every effort is being made to find new ways of performing necessary services to prevent an increase in the present employment levels of the Board and if possible to reduce the level of employment.

This is already reflected by the fact that there were 87 fewer persons employed on January 1, 1959 as compared with January 1, 1958, even though the work volume was substantially increased.

It is a pleasure to conclude my testimony by paying this well-deserved tribute to the members and employees of the Railroad Retirement Board for the efficient manner in which the administration of the Railroad Retirement and Railroad Unemployment Insurance Acts is accomplished and at a minimum of expense .

Such economy of operation is appreciated as efforts are made to find means of wiping out the deficiencies in both the retirement and unemployment compensation funds and to finance the cost of the much-needed amendments to existing laws contained in H.R. 1012.

Mr. Chairman, H.R. 1012 is needed and needed badly. It is the fervent wish of my constituents who will benefit from its enactment that it will become a law at the earliest possible date.

As I stated previously, the Harris bill, H.R. 1012, contains in one package the provisions of my bills, H.R. 1370 and H.R. 1373, and I sincerely hope the legislation will be enacted as quickly as possible and that at a later date the committee will consider the other bills I have introduced to amend the Railroad Retirement Act.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, February 5, 1959

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that my district is vitally interested in the successful and prosperous continuance of the flint glassworkers to maintain their employment, I deem it important that the following analysis of the escape clause provisions be inserted in the RECORD.

Most of this material appeared in a comprehensive statement delivered by O. R. Strackbein before the U.S. Tariff Commission for the American Flint Glass Workers' Union, January 27, 1959.

The American Flint Glass Workers' Union in whose behalf I appear before this Commission speaks for a majority of the employees engaged in the manufacture of hand-blown glassware in this country.

This union has not itself filed an application under section 7 of the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1951 as amended, but wishes to go on record in support of the application filed by the handmade table and decorative ware division (division H) of the American Glassware Association.

The welfare of the industry that employs the members of the American Flint Glass Workers Union is of vital concern to these members. Injury to the industry from imports means injury to our membership. In fact, the workers are usually in the first line of defense wherever imports strike the market in competition with the goods that are manufactured in this country.

One of the first steps that the manufacturer takes when imports seriously interfere with the sale of his products, reducing either the margin of profit or sales volume, or both, is to curtail employment. This he does in one of several ways, or a combination of them.

He may lay off a part of his work force; he may reduce the number of hours of work per day; or he may go on a short workweek. His purpose will be to avoid adding more output to his stock when the goods are slow moving and high priced, hoping thus to adjust his inventory to the downtrend of his sales. In order to do this he must reduce the flow of goods from the factory; and the only normal way of doing this is to curtail man-hours of production.

The worker thus becomes a buffer between the manufacturer and rising imports. Whether the manufacturer succeeds in stopping the import tide by the measures he takes toward retrenchment depends on the character of the import competition. Should the foreign manufacturers of sources of the imports be well equipped for long-term competition on an upward trend, the efforts to make an inventory adjustment would be of little avail.

In that event, any successive temporary expedients resorted to by the domestic manufacturers would be utterly inadequate. The failure of such efforts to adjust stocks to a lower level of demand by reduction of man-hours of work would then call for a permanent readjustment. Of course, imports might continue to rise in spite of more drastic new steps and it might be necessary to repeat them. In the end the situation would become chronic and some manufacturers would become desperate. Here and there a close-down would occur, possibly with the hope of reopening when the outlook might turn for the better.

The hand-blown glassware industry has experienced many difficulties of this character; and the outlook continues to be discouraging. Not only have imports continued to increase in the past 10 years but the trend of the domestic industry is downward in terms of the share of the market supplied by it.

A declining share of the market is important among the criteria of injury found in the escape clause. Indeed, a relative decline in a domestic producer's share of the market removes all doubt about the whereabouts of the competitive advantage. It means simply that the domestic industry is on the run.

Now, it is assumed altogether too often that inability to hold its own competitively with imports marks a domestic industry as inefficient. This assumption lacks even the virtue of fairness. It is like blaming a horse that carries a heavy handicap for not winning a race. American producers carry burdens far greater than foreign manufacturers. Most of this comes from the higher wages that set off our economy and standard of living from those of other countries. Should our wages be reduced to the level of those prevailing in other countries our producers, we may be sure, would have no difficulty competing. They need then be no more efficient than they are now in order to compete. Indeed, with still lower wages, they could come into a position to drive the imports from the market. But we would lose our high standard of living in the process.

Numerous economists, imbued with much beside practical experience, persist in saying that our higher wages are offset by our higher productivity. In repeating this fallacy, they exhibit a stubbornness that might be put to better uses in the land of make-believe. The very facts of daylight belie what these economists say. They refuse to credit the words of those who have daily experience in the marketplace. Imported goods are constantly underselling those of our own manufacture. The proof of the pudding is in the eating.

Why should this process of underselling be in any way surprising? Since the last war, billions of dollars worth of modern machinery and equipment has gone overseas from this country and has been installed in many hundreds of factories. Also more than 8,000 productivity teams from abroad have come to this country to study our production methods.

Beyond this it should be clear now, notwithstanding the peculiar notions of the academic economists, that the American industrial system has no corner on the technological arts nor on science, nor therefore on high productivity. Other countries are capable of developing and installing modern machinery on their own and are doing so.

From these considerations and others it follows that the indictment of inefficiency will not lie against American industry merely on evidence of inability to compete with imports, nor on the mere word of unseasoned economists.

In the case of hand-blown glassware the direct labor cost is high. Because there is little or no mechanization in this branch of the glass industry in this country, and lacking also in other countries, we witness virtual barehanded competition between labor here and abroad, with not much cushion between them. It would be expected that the domestic industry would find great difficulty in competing with imports, and the facts support the expectation.

It should have been obvious that no tariff reductions should have been made in the first instance; but they were made nevertheless.

The evidence of serious injury is to be found in the trend of imports compared with the trend in domestic production. Imports have come to equal and then to pass domestic production. This is shown by statistics that will be furnished to the Commission by the industry and may be verified by investigations of its own by the Tariff Commission.

The American Flint Glass Workers Union has ascertained from its records in 10 unionized companies manufacturing hand-blown glassware that employment of skilled workers was 979 in April 1949 compared with 667 in April 1958. Miscellaneous workers declined during the same period from 2,526 to 1,625. The respective totals are 3,505 in April 1949 and 2,292 in April 1958. This represents a decline of 35 percent in employment in 10 years in these plants. Imports, on the other hand, increased threefold or more.

To the union this has the appearance of serious injury. To the industry it spells desperation, and the industry will submit other compelling evidence of serious injury.

Since the sole function of the Tariff Commission in an escape-clause action is a finding on injury and recommendation of a remedy, it will be in order to inquire how far this carries us.

In 1943 an escape clause was indeed inserted into a trade agreement for the correction of any injury that might develop; and such a clause was placed in all subsequent agreements. In 1947 the clause was given greater recognition in the form of an Executive order. In 1951 a statutory escape clause came from congressional action. It says simply that—

> No reduction in any rate of duty * * * or other concession * * * shall be permitted to continue in effect when the product on which the concession has been granted is, as a result * * * of the duty or other customs treatment reflecting such concession being imported into the United States in such increased quantities, either actual or relative, as to cause or threaten serious injury to the domestic industry producing like or directly competitive products.

The President himself has said:

> The President has the responsibility of considering, not only the question of injury to a domestic industry * * * but also the other fundamental questions bearing on the security and well-being of 165 million Americans. The President's final judgment in each case must represent the best composite evaluation he can make of these questions.

This statement may be found in the Bicycle case decided August 18, 1955. He listed five issues that must be decided in an escape-clause case and limited the Tariff Commission's function to the question of "injury and relief to a domestic industry."

The four issues falling in the President's sole jurisdiction and free of any testimony that might be given in public hearings were asserted by the President to be, first, our national security interest in the economic strength of valued allies in the world; second, building export markets for products of our farms, factories, and mines; third, compensation to other countries for withdrawal of concessions; and, fourth, protection of the American consumer against unnecessary and unjustified price increases.

Mr. Speaker, the wide open prairies of the West could hardly offer wider avenues for circumvention of what should be due process of law than the practice thus followed by the President in the administration of the escape clause. This, let me emphasize, is no fault of the Tariff Commission itself.

How have the four factors other than injury intruded themselves upon the scene? By what justification? The escape clause is in the nature of a reservation that permits withdrawal or modification of a concession if a certain contingency develops in fact, namely actual or threatened serious injury. That is what Congress has provided in its wording of the escape clause, quoted above. The only remaining question should be one of fact; and the finding of such fact is the function of the Tariff Commission. The law contains not one word that calls upon the President to gather an unknown volume of additional evidence outside the hearing process and with it to swamp the Tariff Commission's recommendation at will and without compunction.

Unless the Tariff Commission's recommendations should call for a duty higher in its protective effect than that from which it was reduced in a trade agreement, or a proposal for a quota that would rob the country extending a reciprocal concession, as a quid pro quo, of its bargain, such recommendation should be proclaimed without question by the President. He should regard it as representing the invocation of a reservation in keeping with the widely proclaimed policy of avoiding or preventing serious injury to industry. Only if judicial review disclosed improper procedures or insufficient evidence or similar failures of the Commission, should its findings be set aside. The President should stand by his own appointed Commission. The propriety of its findings and the adequacy of its procedures should be left to the judiciary.

Mr. Speaker, under the publicly avowed policies, many times repeated, as documented in the review offered for the record, stating in effect that the trade agreements program is not to injure our industries and that a sure remedy is at hand if injury nevertheless takes place, there is no place for supplemental evidence and trumped-up issues beyond the evidence taken at hearings before this Commission on the question of injury.

It would be difficult indeed to find any support in law or elsewhere for the practice of treating delegated power as authority to skirt not only the law itself but other elements of due process. Yet this is precisely what has been done by the executive branch of the Government in its disposal of Tariff Commission recommendations under the escape clause.

Mr. Speaker, that abominable practice should cease; and the findings of the Commission in the question of injury from imports should be the last word.

An Appropriation for the U.S. Coast Guard Academy

OF
HON. CHESTER W. BOWLES
OF CONNECTICUT
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, February 5, 1959

Mr. BOWLES. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced an appropriation bill of $6,565,000 to replace wornout and obsolescent facilities at the U.S. Coast Guard Academy in New London, Conn.

The bill provides money necessary to carry out the recommendations of the Board of Visitors to the U.S. Coast Guard Academy, which were contained in a report to Congress on May 2, 1958.

In its report, the board expressed its concern over the "continued existence and use of World War II wooden buildings for various activities of the Coast Guard Academy."

The board reported that immediate replacement of the outmoded structures would result in long-range savings by removing excessive maintenance costs and would eliminate hazardous occupancy.

Mr. Speaker, I think none of us needs to be reminded of the valuable and courageous contribution of the Coast Guard in times of war. They were in the thick of battle as an integral part of the Navy, sailing the same seas and running the same risks.

Nor have they been any less active in times of peace. In addition to patrolling our shores, they perform valuable rescue work, they keep open the sea lanes of the North Atlantic, and they are making water travel safe for surging motor- and pleasure-boat activities.

Yet if we do not provide sufficient funds, we will be striking at the very heart of the service—the Coast Guard Academy. This is where the new officers are trained; this is where the young service minds are shaped. We must not allow their welfare and training opportunities to deteriorate.

It is my sincere belief that as long as the United States recognizes the need for a Coast Guard, it has the obligation to maintain the service in a state of preparedness equal to the efforts made in behalf of the other armed services.

Mr. Speaker, the Coast Guard Academy is only 19 miles from my home and I know it well. It is under excellent management and it has close and most cordial relations with the New London community.

I might add that the New London Chamber of Commerce recently made a special study of conditions at the Academy and concurred in the recommendations made by the Board of Visitors.

Undoubtedly many Members of the House recall that last year a sum of $2 million was appropriated to replace the wooden cadet barracks. All friends of the Academy were gratified by this step forward. But, as the report indicates, much still remains to be done.

Therefore I have introduced a bill based on the report which would provide money for:

First. New barracks, new classroom and administration buildings for the officer indoctrination and candidate schools.

Second. Additional cadet classroom space to accommodate the increased enrollments.

Third. An auditorium for the Academy to replace the present wooden structure which the board called a fire hazard and too small for corps purposes.

Fourth. Major repairs to the Academy docks and causeway that have badly deteriorated.

Fifth. The construction and improvement of other Academy structures that are presently inadequate, outmoded, and hazardous.

The cost of these improvements are based on estimates prepared by the Coast Guard Academy. I would like to point out here that the sum of $6,565,000 does not include an estimate for the construction of officer candidate school facilities. I have specifically stated in the bill that part of the money be used for that purpose because the operation of the school is an integral part of the Academy.

The money will have to come out of other projects, upon which the estimate was based. So even this sum of $6,565,000 may not be fully adequate to meet the entire need. Yet this is the very least we can do.

Mr. Speaker, since this sum was not included in the Treasury's budget for the fiscal year 1960, despite my pleas and those of others, I have introduced this bill in the earnest hope that the Appropriations Committee will take these pressing needs into consideration.

Although I realize that separate appropriation items are almost never reported to the floor of the House, I will be deeply grateful if this bill alerts the committee to what I believe to be a most urgent situation before it reports out the final Treasury appropriation bill now under consideration.

Westside Jewish Community Center, of Los Angeles, Offers Lesson in Community Living

OF
HON. JAMES ROOSEVELT
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, February 5, 1959

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, 5 years in the history of mankind is a brief span. But when 5 years span the lives of thousands of persons, each and every year becomes more important and valuable than the mere number of days they indicate.

I make this above observation because there is an organization in Los Angeles, Calif.—and I am more than pleased that the activities of this group take place in my district—which gives factual proof to this contention. The organization to which I refer is the Westside Jewish Community Center which, during its first 5 years of existence, has offered service and brought happiness to thousands of persons.

The record of the Westside Jewish Community Center is already an impressive one, and presages for the future the enriching of many more lives.

Mr. Speaker, I offer some facts and figures about the humanitarian undertakings of this organization, behind each of which is a human being, young or old.

Built at a cost of $2 million, the Westside Jewish Community Center opened its doors on March 1, 1954, and now celebrating its fifth anniversary, the center pridefully points out that it serves almost 7,000 members each year. The aggregate attendance has been approximately 2½ million, a figure equal to the estimated population of the city of Los Angeles.

The center serves as a threshold to community life for many newcomers to Los Angeles, particularly young adults and is open to all members of the community. Inability to pay is no bar to membership, as budget plans are possible and several scholarship funds are available.

The significance of this undertaking is focused on the fact that persons of all ages are able to get together to learn from each other and to find a spirit of camaraderie in a highly populated, broadly spread community.

Through the activities offered—in the fields of athletics, art, dancing, swimming, crafts, music, to mention a few—adults are afforded the opportunity to develop both professional and social skills. More than 700 children have learned to grow up in a new and ever-changing world through the guidance of a skilled nursery school; over 2,000 children have experienced the opportunity to go to camp sponsored by the center.

The community spirit of the Westside Jewish Community Center has been further demonstrated by its action of opening its facilities for meetings and events to other community groups including, among others, Community Chest, Girl Scouts, and Red Cross.

I am sure that there are many others who join me in congratulating the center on its fifth anniversary and in wishing it all success in the years to come.

Next Question, Please

OF
HON. STEWART L. UDALL
OF ARIZONA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, February 5, 1959

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, I know from conversations with a number of my colleagues on our side of the aisle that they have had numerous questions in their minds regarding President Eisenhower's true position on the matter of public revenues and Federal programs. To inform their innocence, or rather, as I was saying, to straighten out certain things in their minds, I present the following excerpt from the President's press conference yesterday before he left to shoot quail in Georgia:

Question. Peter Lisagor, Chicago Daily News: Mr. President, you said that you did not think the American people wanted higher taxes. You also said that you thought localities ought to do some of the things.

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

Question. Lisagor: Such as the airport. Governor Rockefeller, of New York, has found it necessary to move to get more taxes for what he regards as desirable programs.

Do you think the American people would be willing to accept tax increases from the State, rather than from the Federal Government? Do you think this is a better approach?

The PRESIDENT. Well, I do not know, because I don't know the rate of that taxation for these several States. This is what I was talking about.

The Federal rate of taxation and what I see as the American reluctance to accept higher rates, unless they can see that there is a clear emergency demanding now current action for which they can be persuaded to make the sacrifice, and I believe they will, if you have got an emergency thing. But now, let's remember we are planning for 20 years, 30 years, 40 years. We have got to live with this thing.

And as we know, as the population grows, we get more revenues, but we also get in some of these things very much higher costs. So let us not—when we remember that our taxes run from down to—we have got a $600 exemption, and we run up to 92 percent, I believe it is, in the very top ones—I think that income taxes, which are the things that the Federal Government mainly lives on, that they are getting about as high as you can keep them on the indefinite basis.

Now, I believe you can, for emergency, tough problems, I think you can do more than that.

Question. Sterling F. Green, Associated Press: Thank you, Mr. President.

(Whereupon, at 10:29 a.m., the press conference was concluded.)

Coal by Wire

OF
HON. ELIZABETH KEE
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, February 5, 1959

Mrs. KEE. Mr. Speaker, 5 years ago a group of businessmen and union officials, all of them confident of the potential of electric heating, met in my office. Among those who took part were representatives of Appalachian Electric Power Co., National Coal Association, United Mine Workers of America, and electrical equipment manufacturers.

My interest in the expansion of electric utilities service is obvious enough. Mr. Speaker, West Virginia is the Nation's greatest coal-producing State, and from the Fifth Congressional District comes almost 30 percent of West Virginia's total coal output. The coal industry, directly or indirectly, is responsible for most of the subsistence of the residents of our district. When the miner receives a pay check, a widespread chain reaction takes place. The grocer gets a good portion of what the miner earns. The landlord from whom he rents or the bank with which he has his mortgage comes in for a regular percentage. The miscellany of other recipients includes the barber, the clothier, gasoline station, service utilities, and our churches. Needless to say, our Federal, State, and local governments come in for important shares of every dollar that the miner earns.

Our railroad industry receives much of its revenue from coal traffic. Without that traffic, both operational and maintenance employees are without work.

Supplying coal mines is a big business in southern West Virginia. Timber, steel products, electrical equipment, petroleum products, and many other items are used in heavy quantity by our mines.

Appalachian Electric Power Co. is itself an essential source of employment for many of our people, both in its offices and on its field staffs. What is more, the West Virginia generating stations of Appalachian Electric consume more than 3½ million tons of coal annually. As electric heating grows in popularity, this order will increase substantially. The Appalachian Co. has been in the vanguard of the coal-by-wire effort. Through its advertisements and other promotional activities, it has helped to make West Virginians more conscious of the economic value of the electric heating program.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not want anyone to lose sight of the fact that, although the market has declined seriously since the end of World War II, the use of coal in home furnaces is still very important to the industry. Nationwide, some 12 million residential units are kept warm by coal heat. The development of convenient stokers and ash-hauling equipment makes coal all the more attractive domestically, particularly because of its price stability in recent years. We are not suggesting conversions from coal furnaces. We do believe it to the benefit of builders and the public in general to call attention to the advantages of heating by electricity. For this reason, I am always happy when a publication devotes space to the growing popularity of electric heating.

Coal Age, a McGraw-Hill publication whose editor, Iven Given, is a native of Sutton, W. Va., and who is probably one of the best informed authorities on the mining industry, featured an article on electric heating in its January issue. Written by W. A. Raleigh, Jr., associate editor, this comprehensive review of the many facets of electric heat not only captures the imagination of investors, architects, and builders, but also offers an interesting study for anyone who is thinking of buying a new home now or in the future. I commend it to the attention of all who may read these remarks.

Mr. Speaker, I should also like to say that an excellent series of articles on "Coal by Wire" has appeared over the past few months in the United Mine Workers of America Journal. This effort has resulted in an availability of printed material that will enable any interested home purchaser or homebuilder to make his own choice of heating equipment based upon installation costs and present and future fuel crisis and supply.

From time to time Mr. Speaker, I hope to refer to these informative articles so that a digest of their contents may become an official part of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The Unlocked Back Door of the Federal Treasury

OF
HON. THOMAS M. PELLY
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, February 5, 1959

Mr. PELLY. Mr. Speaker, the first budget-buster bill is on its way, and the boobytrap to catch those of us who are trying to hold the line on Federal taxes as well as spending has passed the House. I was 1 of the 89 to vote against this bill. I am referring to H.R. 2256, the bill which provided $300 million for direct Government loans to veterans.

Let me make it clear, as was pointed out when the House was debating this bill, there is presently available $192 million for these direct loans, but with the realistic interest rates in the new bill I doubt if there will be a demand for funds. Private capital will meet the need and that is the way it should be.

Furthermore, as my colleagues are well aware, this $300 million was not in the budget. That is why I, for one, did not deviate from my firm determination to support holding the line on spending.

Mr. Speaker, the debate on H.R. 2256 and this $300 million unbudgeted item brought out some other facts which needed airing. In the discussions from both sides of the aisle, there was strong criticism of what has been going on and what is one of the major causes of Federal deficits. In other words, all of a sudden out in the open comes the admission of a means of back-door approach to the Treasury, which has been used to open wide the spending floodgates and to bypass the constitutional requirement of congressional review and the prohibition that no money shall be withdrawn from the Treasury of the United States, except by appropriation pursuant to law.

It was pointed out that by authorization bills, which state the administrator of an agency in question may issue notes, it has been possible to get money direct from the Secretary of the Treasury who is required to cash these notes. Thus, the need as to the spending of such funds has not been studied or approved by the House or Senate.

Furthermore, the Constitution specifically provides that all revenue measures must originate in the House of Representatives, yet, as was brought out in the debate on veterans housing, 16 bills calling for $9 billion of expenditures last year came to the floor of the House with that provision in them and 12 of these bills originated in the other body.

Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the Rules Committee has introduced a resolution which, as I understand, would require conformity with the Constitution covering appropriations. I hope it will come to the floor and if so I will support it. It is the only way to hold the line on spending.

Meanwhile, I want to emphasize that the $300 million for direct loans to veterans, which I voted against, was an example of the back door Treasury type of legislation and in large measure is the way deficit spending has been flourishing.

I do not desire to inject politics today in this statement, but for myself I must ask to be counted in disagreement with those of the opposition leadership who seek to excuse this back door approach on the grounds that without it much progressive legislation, as it is called, would not be enacted. If legislation cannot stand up under constitutional legislative process and review within the framework of constitutional procedure and congressional approval, either the Constitution should be amended or the measures not enacted into law.

The salvation of our country to my way of thinking, as recognized by the Founding Fathers, lies in control by the representatives of the people of the right to appropriate money. If we abrogate the provision that no funds shall be withdrawn from the Treasury except by lawful appropriation by the Congress, there will be little hope of checking inflation and maintaining fiscal responsibility.

Finally, let me say, as I have said so many times in the past, let us redouble our efforts to curb unneeded spending and remember that the money we handle belongs to the taxpayers and the debt we incur is their obligation and liability; not ours alone.

Creating an ever-expanding national debt to be loaded upon our children I cannot view with equanimity. Especially so in a time of comparative prosperity and highest earnings and wages in history. I cannot join the spenders and charge off deficits to "balanced human budgets"—except in times of economic crisis.

My conscience cries out that presently, as we spend more, we should tax more, and I am against both of these. They are not necessary. So I urge locking the back door of the Federal Treasury and restoring control to Congress.

Mr. Speaker, in answer to Thomas Jefferson, if a choice is necessary, I will support economy and liberty as against profusion and servitude, especially, as it may be in the latter case, it would be visiting our sins upon the third and fourth generation.

Airline Accidents

OF
HON. ALBERT H. BOSCH
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, February 5, 1959

Mr. BOSCH. Mr. Speaker, another accident in the vicinity of La Guardia Airport. How long must we wait to get corrective legislative action? This plane could just as well have fallen in the congested areas of Queens County, resulting in untold suffering and devastation, not only to those traveling in the plane but also to those on the ground.

Previous hearings indicate that about 90 percent of plane accidents are the result of bad-weather flying. The present regulations are too liberal—they need strengthening. It is our obligation to take this matter under advisement and to provide such action.

The crash of the American Airliner in the East River on February 3 is but one of many accidents which have occurred in the New York area in recent years during inclement weather. To cite a few, in April 1952 five persons were killed and four houses were destroyed when a plane crashed in Jamaica, Queens County, after it missed its landing at Idlewild Airport; in October 1953 two persons were killed and others injured when a plane crashed while taking off in fog at La Guardia Airport; on December 18, 1954, an Italian DC–6–B airliner roared low over homes and densely populated areas in the vicinity of Idlewild Airport, not once but three times, and finally, on a fourth approach ripped into a Jamaica Bay pier, burst into flames, and sank in the water, killing 26 persons.

To elaborate on this crash in December 1954, the airliner left Boston in bad weather for Idlewild where the weather was rapidly closing in; when the plane arrived at New York the ceiling was just about 200 feet—the minimum ceiling, under present regulations, for landing; the pilot had to drop below this minimum in order to establish visual contact with the ground—one point we must bear in mind is that before a pilot can effectively land upon any landing strip, whether guided by instruments or not, he must establish visual contact with the ground.

Now, this most recent crash in New York reveals that the ceiling was 400 feet at the time of the crash. In a report titled "Sensory Illusions of Pilots," published several years ago by the Flight Safety Foundation, Chief Pilot P. P. Cocquyt of Belgium's Sabena Airline, said that an overwater approach robs a pilot of landmarks by which to judge altitude visually. He often believes he is higher than he actually is and the illusion will cause him to descend toward the runway lights at a steeper angle than is warranted. I think it is safe to assume that the pilot of this plane, acknowledged by the company to be "one of the finest pilots American Airlines has ever had," lost his depth perception.

Mr. Speaker, I have cited these cases to point up the need for legislation to establish by law safety regulations to stop these bad weather accidents.

As my colleagues know, I have in the past two Congresses introduced legislation to raise, by law, the minimum visibility requirements for takeoffs and landings at the airports in the New York area. I have again introduced this legislation, which I feel would do much to avoid some of the catastrophes which have happened in the past and which I have outlined above. These bills are H.R. 4179 and H.R. 4180 which have been referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. In addition, I have introduced House Resolution 162 to create a select committee to conduct an investigation and study of the powers and functions of agencies over the operation of aircraft which was referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. Speaker, time for talking has passed; it is time for action. I urge my colleagues to join me in urging these committees to act speedily on my bills. It is my firm conviction that they merit enactment.

Medal of Valor Awarded to Oakland Policeman Robert Ross

OF
HON. GEORGE P. MILLER
OF CALIFORNIA
Thursday, February 5, 1959

Mr. GEORGE P. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, the East Bay Police and Fire Post, Veterans of Foreign Wars, has awarded the Medal of Valor to Oakland policeman, Robert Ross, 32, 14317 Bradley Street, San Leandro, Calif., for the performance of duties above and beyond the call of his official duty.

Last March Patrolman Ross went inside a tanker that was moored at the foot of Oakland's embarcadero to rescue three men who were inside the tanker, overcome by leaking gas fumes.

The citation given Ross reads in part:

A man's quick thinking and immediate action saved the lives of three workmen.

Ross and Charlie Kitchen, 30, a shipyard worker also from San Leandro, lowered themselves 40 feet into the tank of an oil barge where the three men were overcome by fumes. They secured lines about the men and a crane pulled them to safety as Ross and Kitchen guided the cables.

Ross is married and has two children, Karen, 9, and Robert, 6.

Judge Homer Buckley, Oakland municipal court, presented the medal and citation at a meeting held in the Veterans Memorial Building.

The Medal of Valor is given annually to an outstanding East Bay fireman and policeman. This year the medal was given only to Ross, since no firemen were nominated by the judging committee for the honor.

Legislation To Create a Coal Research and Development Commission Will Prove a Boon to the Nation's Coal Industry and Should Receive Favorable Consideration by the 86th Congress

OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, February 5, 1959

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, on January 7 I introduced H.R. 1179 which would create a Coal Research and Development Commission as an independent agency. A number of other Members of this House on both sides of the aisle have introduced like proposals. It is our hope that this legislation can be acted upon expeditiously and that the coal research body can be put into operation soon.

This legislation is identical to bills which were introduced in the 85th Congress. In the Senate the bill was passed and sent to the House. In this body the legislation was approved by the House Interior and Insular Affairs Committee, but was caught in the rush of legislation during the final days of the session.

The creation of the independent Coal Research and Development Commission is the only type of coal research legislation which has met with the approval of both management and labor in the coal industry. When a subcommittee of the House Interior Committee, of which the present chairman of the committee was a member, hearings were held on this type of research agency. In addition to witnesses representing the coal operators and the United Mine Workers of America, the committee heard advocates for the legislation from the railroads, the mine machinery suppliers, industrial consumers, Governors and other officials of coal-producing States, and representatives of coal communities. All were in agreement that the type of research agency as proposed in this legislation would be a boon to the coal industry.

As a member of the Joint Atomic Energy Committee, I have personal knowledge of the vast sums of money which have been and are now being spent on the experimentation of an atomic reactor designed to produce commercial power. Certainly if we can afford to spend such astronomical sums on a source of energy which is now in the experimental stage, we can well devote a small percentage of that amount to further research developments of a fuel that has been the principal source of our economic power in every emergency that this country has faced.

I sincerely hope that for the benefit of the thousands of unemployed mine workers and railroad workers in my district that we can have early committee action on the various legislative proposals to establish the much-needed and essential Coal Research and Development Commission.

OF

HON. JOHN H. DENT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 5, 1959

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, in order to clear up any misunderstanding on my proposal for the creation of a Coal Research Commission, I submit the following analysis and argument.

COAL PROBLEMS

The serious condition of the coal industry can be directly traced to the following sources:

First. Importation of fuel oil.

Second. The subsidization of other power sources.

Third. The favored position given to competitive domestic fuels taxwise by existing laws.

Fourth. The high cost of transportation of coal which, in some instances, is higher than the production costs.

Fifth. Our foreign trade and air policies which are responsible for a reduction of American production which in turn reduces the use and need of fuel.

The Canadian Government has long ago realized this and has had in operation at least two major operations for the benefit of the coal industry.

First. They subsidize coal by paying a subvention on coal transportation to enable the producer to meet competition with other domestic fuels as well as American imports.

Second. They maintain a complete unit for research into the uses, production and marketing of coal through a coal research commission.

Even this last operation has been denied our coal industry.

We have research and study commissions on many subjects and yet, we refuse as a body to pass the necessary enabling legislation to create a study commission for coal.

Why? Simply because other fuel sources oppose the coal industry. In passing, it might be interesting to note that more payroll dollars are paid out by the coal industry per B.t.u. of heat energy than any other source of fuel.

For years the membership of the House of Representatives coming from the coal mining areas have been attempting to pass legislation to create a Coal Research Commission.

It has always been defeated by arguments based upon economy. Nothing could be farther from the truth than the statement that "we can't afford a study commission for coal."

In the face of the declining fuel market for coal, the subsidization by the Government of TVA atomic powerplants, and other fuel sources makes it imperative for coal to find new uses and new markets.

One such outlet is fast disappearing. That outlet was called the foreign shipments market.

Recently, the following stories appeared in the public press:

Bonn puts embargo on imports of coal.

Six nation trade agreement group to put limitations on coal imports. Study plan to subsidize this domestic coal to compete with American imports.

Recently, West Germany put a tariff on coal of $4.79 a ton.

The above-captioned stories tell a very sad story. While we are opening our tariff doors wider and wider for foreign made goods, our so-called friends are clamping down on our products just as quickly as they become self-sufficient.

There is a growing suspicion too, that some of our own foreign aid money will be used to subsidize our competitors.

This, of course, would not be a new phase in our international policies. It has been going on for some time in other fields of American production.

The history of coal is the history of steel and the history of steel is the history of our phenomenal growth as a producing, successful nation.

There are still untapped reserves sufficient to provide fuel needs for many, many years.

However, in the face of present and future threats to this industry from other fuel sources, it becomes our duty to help this industry and the thousands of families and hundreds of communities that depend upon coal for their welfare and in some cases, their very existence.

There can be no valid argument to offset the arguments so far advanced. I expect to present a new bill which will make the Commission self-sustaining.

I would increase the coal depreciation allowance from 5 to 15 percent—oil and gas enjoy a 27-percent allowance—and take a certain per tonnage assessment against all coal mined to carry out the work of the Study and Research Commission.

It is estimated that we have coal reserves beyond our needs for the foreseeable future.

Coal is one of the world's most versatile minerals. Its uses are limitless. The need now is for the proper study of its many byproducts with the goal in mind of preserving both the industry and the jobs of its employees.

The stubborn, and sometimes blind, opposition to the Commission fails to recognize that our neighbor Canada has such a commission and has for years been giving its coal industry government subsidies in both government-financed research and direct transportation subsidies.

King Coal is not dead, he is just slumbering. He still has the power and the resources to keep alive the fires in the continuing and eternal struggle for the welfare of all the people.

To those of us whose roots are deep down in the bowels of Mother Earth, nurtured by hard times, near starvation, strikes, coal and iron police and meager fare of the old company store, the depreciation of our coal economy strikes us as a real catastrophe.

The sickness of the coal industry is contagious. No one dare really measure the loss sustained by our whole economy when a coal mine shuts down. It is not money alone, it is all of the other values that somehow have become a part of our way of life.

This Congress cannot, in good conscience, refuse again to pass this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I again appeal to the good will and sound judgment of this House to support my bill for the creation of a Coal Research Commission.

Increasing imports of crude and residual oils are having a greater impact on the bituminous coal industry than ever before. Please consider these facts.

The administration's voluntary import control program, even under the broader trade agreements statute enacted in 1958, is not effective in restricting the imports of crude oil and products. Imports of residual oil have not been included in the voluntary control plan.

Residual imports in 1958 were approximately at the 1957 level. Coal production in 1958 was 20 percent below the previous year. Residual imports for the week ending January 9, 1959, averaged 867,200 barrels daily—456,300 barrels daily above the comparable week in 1958. This is the highest level in history. Coal production for the same week was 645,000 tons below the comparable week in 1958.

Total residual imports to January 9 were 7,342,800 barrels, greater by more than 2 million barrels than for the same period in 1958. Total coal production to January 10 was 9,922,000 tons, less by 2,584,000 tons than for the same period last year.

Imported residual prices along the eastern seaboard, the area of greatest impact in coal's markets, have been reduced from $2.57 in August 1958, to $2.37 in January 1959. Thousands of tons of coal's markets have been absorbed as a result of the increased residual imports and reductions in price. Economic conditions in coal-producing areas are deplorable. Unemployment is on the increase, and the number of public assistance recipients is increasing.

Significant facts regarding the proposal for the establishment of a coal research independent agency:

First. In practically all instances where Government-sponsored research programs are in operation, administration and control of such agencies are in the hands of independent agencies, for instance: National Science Foundation, National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, Atomic Energy Commission.

Recently the Department of Defense, within its own organization, has set up a separate and distinct agency for research operations rather than assign control of these activities to the various established Government divisions.

Second. An important research program, such as anticipated, to benefit the coal industry would require high-type administrative personnel. This is obtained in independent agencies, whereas the same option is not available under established agencies. For instance, the chain of command in an existing Government agency would be along the lines of the following: First, secretary of the department; second, under secretary of the department; third, assistant secretary in charge of the particular area; fourth, director of the bureau within which such operations might fall; fifth, assistant director of the bureau; sixth, chief of the division; and, seventh, head of a research program.

In other words, in the average governmental department a coal research program would necessarily fall to an individual in the seventh administrative level.

Third. Traditionally, in moving projects through Government agencies interdepartmental delays tend to hamper expeditious movement. Likewise, most Government agencies are inclined to protect their own "empires" from possible invasion by other Government departments.

Fourth. There has existed for quite some time a natural inhibition on the part of private industry to turn over to an established Government agency information that might result in impediments to such industry competitively. This is particularly true where several competitive industries find their direction under the head of the same department or bureau. In these cases, industries are reticent about giving information and details of activities for fear that it might find its way into the hands of competitors in its own field.

Fifth. The coal industry's desire for a coal research program is for one that would be all comprehensive, and all inclusive. It should not, therefore, be limited to the field of technical research in which most of the existing coal research done by Government has been confined. In addition to the technical aspects of research, the coal industry's suggested program would cover such other areas as market and distribution, transportation, utilization, etc. In Government, in order to find experience and the qualification to evaluate projects in such fields, it would be necessary to refer to several separate existing departments of the Government. This would require a very involved job of coordinating as well as directing.

Sixth. As evidenced by the experience of Government itself in placing research under individual agencies, the problem of administering a research program requires individual and special attention. It is not something that can be operated successfully as an adjunct administrative task involving other operations of a Government department.

House Report 1263, August 27, 1957, "Findings and Recommendations of the Special Subcommittee on Coal Research," in the conclusions of that report on page 29, made the following comments concerning a coal research project:

A short-range, federally supported coal research and development program such as that referred to in the preceding paragraph, if it is to be conducted expeditiously and effectively and achieve the maximum end results, should utilize the research facilities and personnel of industry associations, universities, and other nonprofit organizations, of private consulting firms and of the Department of the Interior and other Federal agencies, to the extent it is practical to do so, and should be administered by an independent Federal agency which must not be shackled and inhibited by such traditional approaches and restrictive policies as control research activities in the Department of the Interior.

As between the work on coal research in existing Government agencies and the suggestion which has been made by the coal industry for an independent agency, this same report, on page 91, makes the following comment:

And the Bureau of Mines, as a matter of policy, does not concentrate its coal research activities on efforts to solve the short-range problems of the industry. Most of the Bureau's work on coal, which now amounts to about $5 million annually, is in the area of long-range research and is of such nature that it appears unlikely the average coal producer will be benefited by it.

With reference to the unanimity of the recommendation for a coal research agency established as an independent agency of the Federal Government, the above quoted report has the following to say:

The Bureau of Mines does not look with favor upon an expanded coal research program along the general lines suggested by the National Coal Association and as suggested by practically every witness appearing before the subcommittee on behalf of the coal producers, mine workers, State organizations, community officials, civic groups, and coal-carrying railroads.

In addition to the congressional comments, the Western State Governors' Mineral Policies Conference on November 7, 1955, advocated an approach similar to that recommended by the coal industry in the following comment from their conference report:

1. Establish at Federal level, and at State level where desirable, permanent minerals research advisory boards. These boards should consider and recommend initiation of research programs, which, in their opinion, are particularly needed.

Excerpt from statement of policy of National Coal Association, page 12:

RESEARCH

Scientific research has made an immeasurable contribution to the economic growth which has made the United States preeminent among the nations of the world. Research should be broadened and intensified to assure further expansion of the Nation's economy and the maintenance of the U.S. leadership. Private industry should continue to play a substantial role in research and make every feasible contribution to the Nation's continued progress. The ultimate in research is beyond the economic capability of some segments of the economy. In furtherance of the national interest and the public welfare, it is incumbent upon the Federal Government to encourage and participate actively in appropriate research in the field of energy resources. An independent Federal agency composed of representatives of industry and Government should be established to aid in developing, coordinating, supervising, and financing an appropriate research program for the extraction, utilization, and consumption of bituminous coal. The program should rely upon existing research facilities to the greatest feasible extent, giving impetus and direction to present research efforts.

The Townsend Plan Bill

OF

HON. JOHN A. BLATNIK

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 5, 1959

Mr. BLATNIK. Mr. Speaker, for many years legislation embodying the principles of the Townsend plan "pay-as-you-go social security for all" has been before Congress. In the 85th Congress I joined with Representative BURDICK, of North Dakota in sponsoring the Townsend plan bill.

I have introduced H.R. 4000, which is identical with the Townsend plan bill I sponsored in the 85th Congress, and which differs from other bills embodying the Townsend plan, in former years, only in terms of legislative form and in respect to technical construction. It does not differ in respect to any basic principle, objective, or standard. The gentleman from California [Mr. GUBSER] has introduced a companion measure, H.R. 4001.

The 1959 Townsend plan bill is specially drafted as an amendment to the Social Security Act, repealing or suspending, as the applicable case may be, the various provisions of Old Age, Survivors, and Federal Disability Insurance and instituting in place thereof the Townsend Plan program under title II of the act.

Under this bill, a smooth transition from the present system of old-age, survivors, and disability insurance is provided for. No persons entitled to or receiving benefits under the present system will lose a penny of those benefits—because benefits under the 1959 Townsend plan bill will overlap those of the present system until all benefits under the present system are totally absorbed by the benefits under this bill. To the extent that some benefits paid under the present system exceed those initially provided for under my bill, the difference will be paid from the reserve funds of the old-age, survivors, and disability system.

Within 2 years, after the effective date of this Townsend plan program, it will have totally absorbed all benefit obligations of the present system.

This smooth, equitable transition is provided for by these provisions: Six months after its enactment the gross income—gross receipts—tax, upon which H.R. 4000 is based, will go into effect at the rate of 1 percent for a period of 6 months. Then, it will be advanced by one-fourth of 1 percent for each succeeding calendar quarter until it reaches the full tax rate of 2 percent. It will reach this rate of 2 percent as of the 16th month after its effective date.

The initial benefits financed under the 1 percent tax rate will be approximately equal to the average primary benefit paid under the present system—so that, right from the start, present benefits up to the amount of average primary benefits will be absorbed by the Townsend plan program. Then, as the tax rate advances quarter by quarter, benefits will proportionately advance to a level estimated at between $130 and $150 per month.

Thus, virtually every possible benefit-liability of the present system, under title II, will be smoothly absorbed by the Townsend Plan program. If there prove to be some few beneficiaries entitled under the present system, who do not qualify for some unforeseeable technical reasons under the Townsend plan program—they are certainly provided for many times over by the approximately $23 billion reserve funds of the present system. Under my bill, nobody will lose any benefit—and in a short time all will receive better benefits than the present system will afford them. At the same time, once full benefits have been achieved under my bill, we will no longer have people trying to live on benefits capable of affording them nothing better than severe poverty. My bill will really solve the social security problem.

The problem of providing for equitable and smooth transition from the present program has been one of the foremost obstacles in Congress to adoption of the Townsend plan. This bill completely removes this obstacle.

The 1959 Townsend plan bill specifically defines its objectives. It provides that each year the Department of Commerce, under its Census Bureau work of annually surveying the distribution of money income in the U.S. population, will report to Congress, specifically, what rate of the gross income tax would have been necessary during the preceding year, under the program, in order for the overall income of the aged population to have compared favorably with that of the younger, adult population. This feature is designed to create a situation whereunder the Congress—and everybody else—will henceforth know, as a matter of clear record, exactly what the relative position of the aged is economically.

This feature is designed to provide each year a defined basis on which everybody can henceforth deal with the primary problem of just how much pensions should justly be in the light of authentic facts. Up to now, this question of exactly how much pensions really ought to be has not been officially dealt with. The Townsend program is fundamentally predicated upon exactly that study and approach to the whole problem. My bill provides, in the Social Security Act, the legal requirement that this question be authentically reported on each year, to Congress by the Department of Commerce.

Now, there has always been a long list of arguments—in principle, academic arguments—about the workability of the gross income tax on which the Townsend plan is based. This bill provides, in its definition of gross income, the conclusive end to this whole field of confusion due to these purely theoretical and academic arguments, as well as an end to the waste of time and effort in dealing with such unrealistic claims and counterclaims, in a very simple way. Since 1933, a genuine gross income tax has been operating with unchallenged efficiency and practicality in the State of Indiana. Correcting jurisdictional references, the precise text of the definition of gross income contained in the Indiana State gross income tax act of 1933, as amended up to, and including, 1953, is incorporated in the 1959 Townsend plan bill.

It is specifically to be noted that this does not constitute any change in principle or departure in policy by the Townsend organization. The tax proposed in the Townsend bill has traditionally been exactly what is now proposed. However, there have always been those, in and out of Congress, who insisted persistently that the Indiana tax really was not the same, was in reality quite different from the Townsend proposal. This specious argument stands abolished since the 1959 Townsend plan bill contains precisely the same definition of gross income as the Indiana law.

The 1959 Townsend bill provides for old-age retirement at the age of 60 years; for full benefits to persons disabled between ages 18 through 59; for full benefits for female heads of family groups with one or more dependent, minor children; and for proportionate benefits of one-third of the full benefit rate for such dependent children under 18. This last is new coverage.

H.R. 4000 does not require complete and outright, all-or-nothing retirement by beneficiaries, but encourages their participation in the Nation's productivity. At the same time, it provides a deterrent sufficient to prevent pensioners from selling their services so cheaply as to constitute unfair competition with other work-seekers. The provision is that above the amount of $75 per month, adult beneficiaries would lose $1 of their benefit for each full $2 earned in employment or self-employment. For the secondary beneficiaries, the children, they, too, would lose $1 for each full $2 per month earned in excess of $50 in employment or self-employment.

When accorded serious study, the above provisions will be seen—not only as providing reasonable inducement to beneficiaries to supplement their benefits by appropriate participation in the labor force without risking frustrating reductions in their benefits—but, also, as aiding greatly in enabling workers to "ease" into retirement over a period of time and in the rehabilitation of the disabled and "easing" them back into full occupation over a period of time.

The 1958 Townsend bill requires that any person over 18 years of age must have resided in the United States for a total of not less than 10 years in order to qualify for benefits. The reasons for this provision are manifold; but, suffice it to say that very rare would be the citizen of the United States who would not have satisfied this requirement before his childhood was over. At the same time, this requirement, imposed on our own citizens, will abridge the difficulties involved in treaties we have with various nations reciprocally agreeing that we treat each others' nationals exactly as we treat our own citizens; and it will conclusively bar persons from becoming simply retirement emigrees to the United States, since all will have to have been here long enough to support the system quite substantially before becoming eligible to draw its benefits.

The bill exempts persons under 18 from this residence requirement even if the adults upon whom they depend may be barred by this residence requirement.

THE NEED FOR TOWNSEND PLAN LEGISLATION

The need for this type of legislation is embodied, first, in the fact that we have a Social Security Act, in the first place. This means that in 1935 Congress recognized the social security problem to such a degree that the act was adopted. This realization extended to the level of the problem being recognized as, in principle at least, a national, not a local or regional problem—a problem requiring Federal legislative action. This legislative action, itself, certified the ruling conviction that privately the problem could not be handled. Legislating the entirely Federal program embodied in old-age and survivors insurance recognized that the problem was beyond the capabilities of local and even of State governmental scope. The subsequent actions by Congress after 1935—up to and including 1958—certify unanswerably that this conviction as to the solid, national nature of the problem has continuously solidified and strengthened.

When it is all summed up, the truth is this: We have a social security problem simply because the great majority of Americans reach old age only to find themselves lacking the financial ability to command income and living standards reasonably comparable to the general standards of living prevailing around them. The present system of old-age, survivors, and disability insurance has done good as far as it has gone, or could go. However, in recent years it has become clearly evident that the present system is not altering the above stated reason for our having a social security program, in the first place. All we have done has been to prevent the originally deplorable economic position of our aged from becoming still worse. Since the end of World War II, we have not bettered the comparative economic position of our senior citizens. As a group, their income share has remained unchanged while their comparative numbers have increased over three times as rapidly as any other part of our adult population. In fact, in the overall, despite all our efforts under the present system, the comparative income position of our elderly people remains a continually declining one. I repeat, the present program is good—as far as it goes—but, far from solving the social security problem, it continues actually failing to prevent the problem from getting slowly worse.

The bill I have introduced today is squarely based on the belief that Americans desire and should by all means enjoy economic sufficiency and independence as the final result of life. Obviously, if they are ever going to achieve this result, we have no alternative than an entirely new approach to the problem. That new approach is the substance of the bill I have introduced.

Let us look at the facts about the economic position of our elderly people. In February 1954, the Social Security Bulletin carried an article by Jacob Fisher of the Social Security Administration's Division of Research and Statistics, namely, "Postwar Changes in the Income Position of the Aged." This report shows the population aged 65 and over increased 17 percent from 1947 through 1952—while the total population aged 14 and over increased only 5 percent—but their share of total personal income increased from 7 percent in 1947 to only 8 percent in 1952.

Analysis of Census Bureau data shows the share of the elderly to have been 7.3 percent in 1953, 7.7 percent in 1954, 7.9 percent in 1955, 7.6 percent in 1956, and 7.4 percent in 1957. By 1957, the aged population increased 36.9 percent over the 1947 number, while the total population 14 and over, including the aged, increased only 11.5 percent. Thus, the comparative income position of the average aged person declined, seriously, from the admittedly unjust levels of 1947 to an even more inferior level in 1956.

The increase of the aged as a part of our total population continues unabated, while their total share of income remains unchanging. This has taken place despite congressional action in 1950 increasing OASI benefits by 70 percent and in spite of congressional actions each 2 years ever since. It has taken place despite the dramatic increase in private pension systems and the liberalization of just about every existing public and private retirement system, as well.

Since the end of World War II, OASI has not only failed to solve the social security problem; but, it has even failed to prevent it from getting worse.

Furthermore, a 1955 report from the Social Security Administration warns that to establish even so modest a minimum OASI benefit as $75 a month would entail payroll tax rates so high as to endanger public support and acceptance of its contributory principle. This conclusion has repeatedly been urged by this same authority in the discussion of benefit increases ever since.

The facts clearly place before us the unavoidable conclusion that we do not yet have anything resembling a Federal social security program capable of affording the American people the kind of social security they richly deserve. It is in the light of these facts that I have introduced today H.R. 4000 which is designed specifically to provide such a completely desirable social security program under title II of the Social Security Act.

Our ever-increasing ability to produce goods and services dictates that we must keep buying power amongst our population abreast of our ability to produce or suffer again and again the losses in wealth and human welfare so recently experienced because of business recession. It has become more than clear to me that unless we stop destruction of the average American's buying power upon his reaching old age, we can never do this. It is what OASI has clearly failed to do. It is exactly what H.R. 4000, the Townsend plan, will do.

Added to what we authentically know the American people can do privately for their retirement, Townsend plan benefits will end poverty and dependence in old age, establish the aged, as a group, on reasonable income parity with the rest of our adult population—thus amplifying buying power, the only way prosperously to absorb surpluses.

Therefore, the Townsend plan should be adopted immediately, in place of the present system of old-age and survivors and disability insurance.

HOW THE 1959 TOWNSEND PLAN BILL WILL WORK

On the first day of the sixth month beginning after the enactment of this bill, the program will go into effect. For the purposes of simplicity, let us assume that the effective date is January 1.

Then, as of January 1, the tax proposed in this bill will go into effect and the present payroll tax supporting old-age and survivors insurance and Federal disability insurance would cease. For the 6-month period—January through June—the gross income tax will operate at the rate of 1 percent. For the 7th, 8th, and 9th months, the rate will be 1¼ percent; for the 10th, 11th, and 12th months 1½ percent; for the 13th, 14th, and 15th months 1¾ percent; and for the 16th and all succeeding months 2 percent.

Meanwhile, beginning with the seventh month—July—the revenue collected from the first month—January—less, specifically, administrative costs, will be distributed as benefits to the qualified beneficiaries. The amount of benefits will be determined simply by dividing the available revenue—after administrative costs—by the number of primary beneficiaries plus the number of primary beneficiaries represented by the secondary beneficiaries—with each primary beneficiary receiving the resulting sum and each secondary beneficiary receiving his appropriate fraction thereof.

As of the first of the eighth month the revenue from the second month would be so distributed; and, thereafter, as of the first of every month the revenue collected from the sixth preceding month would be so distributed as benefits.

Thus, as the tax rate matures and as beneficiaries qualify, the program will ease into full effect in between 1½ and 2 years of its effective date.

Statistical studies show that as of the 7th through the 12th month, the first benefits under this program would amount to between $60 and $70 per month. Then, based on the advancing tax rate described above, benefits would progressively increase to averages of twice that amount.

H.R. 4000 provides that benefits under old-age and survivors and disability insurance will continue to be paid to whatever extent they might be greater than benefits provided by the Townsend plan, and to whatever extent OASDI benefits so continue to be paid they shall be paid out of the OASDI reserve funds.

However, since the average benefit to retired workers under OASDI is less than $70 a month—and since dependents' and survivors' benefits are but fractions of the workers' primary benefits—it is obvious that the greater part of present beneficiaries will almost immediately be absorbed under the Townsend plan. As this new program matures, under the full 2-percent rate of the gross income tax, there can be no doubt whatsoever that all benefits under the present program would be absorbed.

Nobody can seriously doubt that the $23 billion reserves of the present system are far more than adequate to finance the benefit load incumbent upon them under this bill during this period of transition to this new program.

Let me repeat, at no time will any beneficiary of the present system ever lose 1 penny of any benefit because of the adoption of H.R. 4000; and all will end up incomparably better off than they will ever be under the present system.

The benefit-coverage provided by H.R. 4000 certainly takes account of all who can possibly qualify under the present programs under title II of the Social Security Act; and it takes under its coverage those few elements still excluded under the present programs. It is, indeed, very hard to imagine persons who will be able to qualify under present programs who will not qualify under the Townsend plan. Whatever possible cases there may be are obviously so few and infrequent that they will not constitute anything of such magnitude as to be classed as a problem.

The Townsend program, once operating under the full support of the 2-percent rate of the gross income tax—as indicated by statistics on the population, the distribution of income, and the volume of business in the United States—will provide primary benefits of $130 to $150 a month. This level of benefits, under the coverage provided for in the Townsend bill, will involve a revenue of at least $2.5 billion a month. The immediate question becomes this: How can so large a number of beneficiaries at these benefit-levels be justified? In other words, the immediate question to be settled is that raised by those who are forever denouncing anything that is going to cost money. Obviously, this is a program the financial features of which really raise their dander. However, the answer is not difficult to set forth.

The first fact is a simple one: As of 1956, the group aged 65 and over lacked by just about one-half an equal share of income as compared with younger adults—aged 25 through 64. They endured this lack—about 20 percent of them having no income whatsoever from any source—despite all the programs presently in force under the social security system as it is, despite all other public and private programs, despite the expanded rates of savings and investment that recent times of unprecedented prosperity have afforded.

The answer is that less than the Townsend plan will not fill the gap, will not eliminate the economic inferiority of the aged. Less will not secure the future of the younger people from the fate of economic deterioration when they reach old age and so forth.

So, it comes down simply to this: Is the solution of the social security problem a beneficial thing to our society or not? If it is a beneficial thing to do, then it is worth the price. The Townsend program is simply the only one ever designed and put forth actually to eliminate, fully solve this problem. If the problem is ever to be solved in any other way than through the Townsend plan, it will have to be by providing the same standard of benefits for the same number and classes of people as are provided for under the 1959 Townsend plan bill. That is all there is to it, in reality. Either the problem is a valid one and should be solved, or it should not.

To those who say the financial magnitude of the problem has been overestimated, I say that economic sufficiency and independence should be the final reward in life for the people of the United States; that this requires two things: First, that retired people, retired in this context of social security benefits, be not subjected to an income level that involves poverty, insufficiency in terms of the actual, general standards of the times; and, second, that as an overall group retired people should enjoy an up-to-date share in income and living standards as compared to those enjoyed by younger adult people. Less than this constitutes inferiority, lack of freedom and independence, curtailment of the ability to participate fully in the social, economic life of the day—injustice, in short. The Townsend plan is calculated on the basis of those convictions and standards.

Now, if somebody feels, in their own view, that less than this is really an answer, let them state how much they believe should be the share of the aged. On this basis the whole matter can be settled; but, the burden of proof is theirs. The Townsend bill alone is based upon the square question: How much should an old-age pension be? The Townsend bill provides the ways and means of providing that pension—whatever it should be.

Since it is self-evident that whatever the final decision of Congress turns out to be as to what an old-age pension ought to provide for, there still remains the unassailable truth—"It will require just as much money to be raised for just as many people under any other plan as under the Townsend plan." Therefore, the whole question reverts back to the primary one: Is the genuine solution of the social security problem desirable or not?

To those who feel that it is desirable, we present the Townsend plan, embodying the defined ways and means of solving it. To those who do not wish its solution we say: "It is time you frankly said so." This is the essence of H.R. 4000, the Townsend bill.

SENATE

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1959

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father God, in the hush of this hallowed moment, may all earth's strident voices be stilled, that Thine alone may be heard ere clamoring duties lead us back to the demanding, crowded way.

Save us from the pride of self-will, from enfeebling errors of judgment, from the blindness of prejudice, from vagueness of purpose, from the discouragement of temporary failure, and from lacking a compelling sense of urgency in these days of destiny.

We ask it in the dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

RESOLUTION OF NORTH DAKOTA HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. President, on behalf of my colleague from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER] and myself, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD House Resolution No. 5 adopted by the House of Representatives of the Legislature of North Dakota. The resolution opposes any increase in the Federal tax on motor fuel, I wholeheartedly concur in the resolution.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOUSE RESOLUTION 5

A resolution memorializing the Congress to refrain from enacting any further increases in motor fuel taxes

Whereas certain measures are presently pending before the Congress to increase Federal taxes upon motor fuel by 1½ cents per gallon; and

Whereas motor fuel taxes have until recent years been a type of tax reserved for the States but in recent sessions of the Congress have been to a large extent preempted for Federal revenue purposes, thereby handicapping the financial operations of the States; and

Whereas present high motor fuel taxes place a substantial burden upon the operators of motor vehicles; and

Whereas automobiles and motortrucks have become an essential part of our economy and our way of life and the motor fuel used in such vehicles cannot under any circumstances be considered a luxury item deserving of high rates of taxation; and

Whereas the high motor fuel taxes upon a necessity of life results in the taxation of those citizens who can least afford to pay in the same manner as those of unlimited financial means through increased costs of transportation and the resulting higher prices of goods: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of North Dakota, That the Congress is urgently requested to refrain from further increasing the taxation of motor fuel; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded by the chief clerk of the house of representatives to the President of the United States, the Vice President, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and each member of the North Dakota congressional delegation.

HJALMAR C. NYGAARD,
Speaker of the House.
GERALD L. STAIR,
Chief Clerk of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a resolution of the House of Representatives of the State of North Dakota, identical with the foregoing, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

RESOLUTION OF RHODE ISLAND GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and my colleague, the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], I present for appropriate reference, and ask to have printed in the RECORD, a resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island, as follows:

Resolution memorializing the President of the United States, the Secretary of State of the United States, and the Congress of the United States to enact and maintain tariff rates on textiles, lace, jewelry, and rubber goods imports.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance, and, under the rule, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION MEMORIALIZING THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, THE SECRETARY OF STATE OF THE UNITED STATES, AND THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES TO ENACT AND MAINTAIN TARIFF RATES ON TEXTILES, LACE, JEWELRY, AND RUBBER GOODS IMPORTS

Whereas the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island has respectfully called to the attention of the President of the United States, the Secretary of State of the United States, and the Congress of the United States that textiles, lace, jewelry, and rubber goods manufacturing are major industries in the State of Rhode Island, employing over 54 percent of Rhode Island's manufacturing workers; and

Whereas manufacturing is the foundation of Rhode Island's economy whereby one-half of the entire State's population is directly or indirectly dependent upon such industries; and

Whereas in all of these industries labor and labor costs are vital factors representing about 60 percent of the value of the manufactured product; and

Whereas such products can be and are manufactured today in many parts of the world, often with the aid of American equipment; and

Whereas the consequent threat of price competition from low-wage countries abroad is very real; and

Whereas such large wage rate differentials place American manufacturers at a decided competitive disadvantage, resulting in the loss of hundreds of millions of dollars in manufacturing investments and the unemployment of thousands of Rhode Island industrial workers upon the closing of the mills and factories of this State: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the President of the United States insist on increasing and maintaining proper tariffs on the imports of textiles, lace, jewelry, and rubber goods; and be it further

Resolved, That the Secretary of State of the United States enter into no agreements and make no concessions to any foreign nation which would affect adversely the manufacture and sale of textiles, lace, jewelry, and rubber goods products in the United States; and be it further

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States and more particularly the Committee on Finance of the Senate and the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives take every legislative precaution in enacting legislation to assure the creation and maintenance of proper tariff rates on textiles, lace, jewelry and rubber goods imports; and be it further

Resolved, That duly certified copies of this resolution be transmitted forthwith by the Secretary of State to the President of the United States, the Secretary of State of the United States, to the Tariff Commission of the United States, to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Finance, and to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, and to the Senators and Representatives from the State of Rhode Island in the Congress of the United States, earnestly urging that each use his best efforts to bring about the enactment and maintenance of proper tariff rates on textiles, lace, jewelry, and rubber goods imports, to the end that the manufacture and sale of such goods in the United States are not jeopardized.

PROPOSED CURTAILMENT OF PASSENGER SERVICE BY LEHIGH VALLEY RAILROAD—RESOLUTION

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the mayor and Council of the Borough of South Plainfield, N.J., concerning the possible discontinuance or major curtailment of passenger service by the Lehigh Valley Railroad.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the Lehigh Valley Railroad did give notice of its intention to discontinue all main line passenger trains on and after January 12, 1959; and

Whereas the Interstate Commerce Commission has enjoined the Lehigh Valley Railroad from enforcing its intention until May 12, 1959; and

Whereas the mayor and Council of the Borough of South Plainfield recognize that if the Lehigh Valley Railroad is permitted to discontinue all passenger service great numbers of the citizens of the Borough of South Plainfield and of surrounding communities who presently utilize the commuter services rendered by the said railroad would be seriously injured in their economic and social lives; and

Whereas it is publicly recognized that the continuance of the Lehigh Valley passenger service is essential to public necessity and convenience: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That this resolution be served upon the Interstate Commerce Commission as notice of the opposition of the mayor and Council of the Borough of South Plainfield as well as the citizens thereof against the discontinuance or major curtailment of Lehigh Valley passenger service to this community; and be it further

Resolved, That certified copies of this resolution be sent to Gov. Robert B. Meyner, U.S. Senators Case and Williams, Congressman Frelinghuysen, Senator Lynch, Assemblyman Kurtz, and to the Lehigh Valley Railroad.

MEMBERSHIP OF THE JOINT ECONOMIC COMMITTEE

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I introduce a bill for which I request immediate consideration.

The purpose of the bill is to amend section 5 of the Unemployment Act of 1946 with respect to the membership of the Joint Economic Committee.

The act as now written provides for a committee of 14 members, 7 to be appointed from each House. It also requires that the party representation on the committee shall, as nearly as may be feasible, reflect the relative membership of the majority and minority parties in the Senate and House of Representatives.

Under the present membership ratios between the two parties now existing in both the House and the Senate, it is not possible to allot the assignments between the two parties so as to reflect the true situation. In order to correct the situation and make it possible to carry out the true intent of the act, I am proposing in this bill to increase the committee membership to 16, with each House to appoint 8 members.

The majority party in each House will be entitled to five members on the committee, and the minority party in each House will be entitled to three members. Such a division will fairly accurately reflect the present membership of the Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read, for the information of the Senate.

The bill (S. 961) fixing the representation of the majority and minority membership of the Joint Economic Committee, was read the first time by its title and the second time, at length, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 5(a) of the Employment Act of 1946, as amended (60 Stat. 23, Public Law 304, 79th Congress) is amended to read as follows: "(a) There is established a Joint Economic Committee, to be composed of eight Members of the Senate, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and eight Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives. In each case, the majority party shall be represented by five members and the minority party shall be represented by three members."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request for the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I rise only to note for the RECORD that the majority leader and I have discussed this matter, and the bill is quite in conformity with the intent of the existing law. When the Joint Economic Committee was created, provision was made that, insofar as feasible, the membership of the committee should conform to the party ratios in the Senate and the House. Certainly this bill carries out what was intended in the first instance. So there is no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill (S. 961) was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I move to lay on the table the motion to reconsider.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Illinois to lay on the table the motion to reconsider.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

IMPROVEMENT OF GULF INTRACOASTAL WATERWAY, PORT MANSFIELD, TEX.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to authorize the improvement of the Gulf Intracoastal Waterway at Port Mansfield, Tex.

The bill provides that the improvement be undertaken as recommended by the Chief of the Army Corps of Engineers. Yesterday my good friend, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], requested that the Chief of Engineers' recommendations be printed as Senate Document No. 11. The bill I am introducing grows directly out of those recommendations.

The history of the channel at Port Mansfield is one of local effort that was thwarted by a natural disaster.

Between 1950 and 1957, the people of Port Mansfield spent $2,800,000 on enlarging the harbor and clearing a 9½-mile channel to the gulf. That was done by a navigation district that had only $12 million in taxable valuations.

In October 1957 several storms hit the area. The jetties in the harbor settled more than had been estimated, the harbor shoaled up, and ships were unable to navigate through the pass.

Willacy County Navigation District does not have the means to remedy the damage done by the 1957 storms, and there is a great and growing need that work be done, and done soon, to clear the channel.

The Corps of Engineers has submitted a plan to construct and maintain a dependable entrance channel 14 feet deep and 125 feet wide from the Gulf Intracoastal Waterway to a turning basin at Port Mansfield. In addition, the corps plan calls for a turning basin, a shrimp basin, and a small craft basin at Port Mansfield. The plan has the complete approval of the State of Texas.

Development of the Port Mansfield area will mean additional revenue for the Federal and State Governments. In addition, the channel from Port Mansfield to the gulf is badly needed as a harbor of refuge—the only opening in the barrier island for 130 miles from Corpus Christi to Port Isabel. It will serve the fishing and shrimping fleets, and will provide access to the tideland oil shelf for boats and rigs.

The estimated cost of the project is $3,431,000 for construction, and $165,000 for annual maintenance.

The project is imminently justified, Mr. President. It has the approval of the State of Texas, the Corps of Engineers, and the Bureau of the Budget. The people of Willacy County have done their utmost to provide this channel for the area; and, in my judgment, we can do no less than help them bring it to completion.

I may add, Mr. President, that a similar bill has been introduced in the House of Representatives by my friend, Representative JOE KILGORE, of Texas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 962) authorizing the improvement of the Channel to Port Mansfield, Tex., in the interest of navigation and other purposes, introduced by Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Works.

MODIFICATION OF PROVISIONS OF LAW RELATING TO ATTACHMENT AND GARNISHMENT OF SALARIES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. BIBLE. Mr. President, at the request of the Bar Association of the District of Columbia, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the Code of Law for the District of Columbia by modifying the provisions relating to the attachment and garnishment of wages, salaries, and commissions of judgment debtors, and for other purposes.

A change in the garnishment statutes of the District of Columbia is sorely needed. In the latter days of the 85th Congress, the Senate passed a bill somewhat similar to this one. I sincerely hope that legislation which will correct the present inequities in existing laws will be enacted during the 1st session of the 86th Congress.

This bill is designed to attach wages in staggered amounts. In other words, those who can least afford it would be affected the least by an attachment. The percentages to be used in the event of an attachment are as follows: 10 percent of wages up to $200 per month, 20 percent of that amount over $200 and up to $500 a month, and 50 percent of the wages liable to attachment above the $500 a month figure. There are also included in this proposal certain limitations, to wit: only one attachment upon the wages of a judgment debtor shall be satisfied at one time; and when more than one attachment is issued upon the wages of the same judgment debtor, and is served upon the same employer-garnishee, the attachment first delivered to the marshal shall have priority; nonresident protection; protection for a family who might be receiving support by reason of a court order; and certain periodic accounting requirements, to prevent fraud.

In addition to the bill I am introducing at the request of the District of Columbia Bar Association, I am also introducing, for appropriate reference, a garnishment bill identical to the one that passed the Senate in the 85th Congress, in order that the Committee on the District of Columbia may have the benefit, during its deliberations, of all and any proposals on this subject. It is my understanding that the judiciary of the city is also interested in this bill.

This measure provides a $50-a-week exemption for a debtor, in the event his wages are attached. It also contains most of the provisions in the bar association proposal. There is another important difference, in that under this bill a creditor must file an accounting of the debt after it is satisfied, whereas the bar association proposal calls for a final receipt in garnishment cases. Both bills contain similar sections to protect nonresidents and families which depend wholly or in part on a support order issuing from a District of Columbia court.

I am sure that by the enactment of new legislation in this field we shall correct many of the abuses presently existing and shall cause, as a secondary result, the workload of the local courts to be substantially reduced.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bills will be received and appropriately referred.

The bills, introduced by Mr. BIBLE, by request, were received, read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, as follows:

S. 963. A bill to amend the Code of Law for the District of Columbia by modifying the provisions relating to the attachment and garnishment of wages, salaries, and commissions of judgment debtors, and for other purposes; and

S. 964. A bill to amend the Code of Law for the District of Columbia by modifying the provisions relating to the attachment and garnishment of wages, salaries, and commissions of judgment debtors, and for other purposes.

DISCLOSURE OF CONFIDENTIAL COMMUNICATIONS BY CLERGYMEN AND NEWS REPORTERS

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to provide that clergymen and news reporters shall not be required to disclose confidential communications in Federal courts or before committees of Congress, and for other purposes.

Mr. President, in order that other Senators may have an opportunity to join me in sponsoring the bill, I ask unanimous consent that it lie on the table for 10 days.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will lie on the desk, as requested by the Senator from New York.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill (S. 965) to provide that clergymen and news reporters shall not be required to disclose confidential communications in Federal courts or before committees of Congress, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. KEATING, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) chapter 119 of title 28, United States Code, is amended by inserting immediately following section 1825 of such chapter a new section to be designated section 1826 and to read as follows:

"1826. Privilege of clergymen and news reporters.

"(1) A clergyman, or other minister of any religion, shall not be allowed in any court of the United States to disclose a confession made to him, in his professional character, in the course of discipline, enjoined by the rules or practice of the religious body to which he belongs.

"(2) A person engaged or employed in the work of gathering, compiling, editing, publishing, disseminating, broadcasting, or televising news shall not be required in any court of the United States to disclose the source of information procured by him for such publication, broadcasting, or televising unless such disclosure is necessary in the interest of national security."

"1826. Privilege of clergymen and news reporters."

SEC. 2. Section 102 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended (2 U.S.C., sec. 192) is amended by striking out the period at the end of the section and adding the following: "; Provided, however, That any privilege from testifying accorded by any act of Congress or the principles of the common law, shall be applicable to any such inquiry."

AMENDMENT OF SMALL BUSINESS INVESTMENT ACT

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the tax provisions of the Small Business Investment Act of 1958.

As most of my colleagues know, the passage of the act was hailed enthusiastically throughout the small business community, and there was an immediate surge of interest directed at forming small business investment companies.

A closer scrutiny of the act, however, instilled some doubts in the minds of many of those who we had hoped would help support these sources of long-term credit and equity capital. In large part, I feel that these fears are not necessary, but attempts to clarify certain tax questions with the Internal Revenue Service have not brought results. Therefore, sections of this bill do no more than spell out the congressional intent.

I wish to express my appreciation to the National Association of Small Business Investment Companies for its recommendations regarding this legislation. The advice of the members of that organization has been most helpful. As a part of my remarks, Mr. President, I request unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter addressed to me by the president of the National Association of Small Business Investment Companies, together with a sectional analysis, prepared by me, of the three sections of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the letter and sectional analysis will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 979) to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 so as to provide further incentive for assistance to small business concerns by small business investment companies operating under the Small Business Investment Act of 1958 introduced by Mr. SPARKMAN, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The letter and sectional analysis presented by Mr. SPARKMAN are as follows:

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF SMALL BUSINESS INVESTMENT COMPANIES,
Washington, D.C., January 9, 1959.

Hon. JOHN SPARKMAN,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR SPARKMAN: Our association is gravely concerned over the future of the Small Business Investment Act of 1958. It appears that much of the early interest in the act has been dampened by the realization that serious tax pitfalls await investors in the new companies.

First and foremost among the objectionable tax features of the new program is the impact of the personal holding company surtax on investors in small business investment companies. It is clear that except in unusual circumstances, the surtax imposed by section 541 of the Internal Revenue Code will apply to these companies, and many of the investors who originally announced plans to organize under the new act have either abandoned their plans or are delaying them in the hope that this particular problem can be resolved.

As you know, section 542(c) of the Internal Revenue Code specifically exempts certain banks and other types of lending institutions from the personal holding company provisions of the code. It is our feeling that small business investment companies should likewise be exempt from the very harsh penalties imposed on personal holding companies.

Persons interested in organizing small business investment companies are also concerned about the possible imposition of the surtax on accumulated earnings and profits under section 531 of the Internal Revenue Code. It is our position that this section should not apply to small business investment companies so long as they keep their funds invested, but effort to obtain assurances on this question from the Internal Revenue Service have proven unavailing to date. Potential investors are unwilling to proceed with their plans to organize companies until the threat of the section 531 surtax is removed. We believe that it should be removed by means of legislation that would unequivocally exempt these companies from the imposition of the accumulations surtax where they keep their funds invested.

A third feature of the act which disturbs us is the fact that all of the tax benefits are related to the convertible debentures. Such securities can be issued only by corporations. It is therefore clear to us that the great majority of companies being organized under the act will be concentrating their investments in convertible debentures because of the tax benefits. It appears inevitable that unincorporated businesses, which are generally conceded to constitute 85 percent of all small business entities, will find themselves much less attractive to small business investment companies as borrowers than will corporations capable of offering equity securities. We are of course desirous of seeing all small businesses benefit under the new act, and we believe this could be accomplished by legislation which would extend to the small business investment companies tax benefits on straight loans comparable to those now provided on the convertible debentures. We have in mind legislation which would give a small business investment company an income tax deduction on 15 percent of its interest income, thus balancing the 15-point advantage on dividend income which small business investment companies now enjoy over conventional corporations.

Our association feels that the Small Business Investment Act of 1958 holds great promise for both investors in the new companies and for small business generally. We are concerned, however, lest the problems which I have outlined above should destroy the promise even before the act has had a chance to prove itself. We therefore appeal to you in your capacity as chairman of the Senate Select Committee on Small Business and as one of the chief architects of the new act to introduce legislation in the 86th Congress to cure these problems. I am certain I speak for the vast majority of all responsible individuals interested in the new program in saying that your support of our proposals will earn you the grateful thanks of those interested in the Small Business Investment Act of 1958.

Sincerely yours,

THOMAS GRANT, Jr.,
President.

SMALL BUSINESS INVESTMENT ACT OF 1958—SECTIONAL ANALYSIS OF PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO INTERNAL REVENUE CODE OF 1954

PERSONAL HOLDING COMPANY SURTAX

Problem

Section 541 of the 1954 Internal Revenue Code imposes a surtax of 75 percent on the first $2,000 of undistributed personal holding company income, and 85 percent on the undistributed personal holding company income in excess of $2,000.

It is clear that as the law now stands, companies organized under the Small Business Investment Act of 1958 will be subject to the personal holding company surtax unless the stock in these companies can be distributed so widely as to escape the test imposing the surtax where more than 50 percent of the stock is held by or for five or fewer individuals. Small business investment companies are authorized to have only four types of income, namely dividends, interest, gains from the sale of securities, and fees for managerial and counseling services. The first three categories are clearly personal holding company income and the fees could be, so that except in unusual circumstances, every SBIC will meet the 80 percent test under section 541.

The act was intended to encourage the investment of risk capital, and normally this type of investment is most appealing to high-bracket income-tax payers. But this type of individual is particularly wary of any arrangement that could subject him to the personal holding company surtax. High-bracket taxpayers most interested in the new program want control of their company and the opportunity to direct its affairs. These objectives cannot be attained without running the risk of the personal holding company surtax.

Under section 542(c), banks and certain finance companies are specifically excluded from the category of personal holding company. Bearing in mind the purposes of the Small Business Investment Act of 1958 and the nature of the operations of the companies to be formed under the act, it is submitted that the new companies should be entitled to the same treatment as banks and lending institutions under section 542(c) of the code.

Proposed solution

Amend section 542(c) of the 1954 code to add the following at the end thereof:

"(11) Small business investment companies organized and licensed by the Small Business Administration under the Small Business Investment Act of 1958."

LONG-TERM LOANS

Problem

Those investors who have expressed interest in the Small Business Investment Act of 1958 have made it clear that they are attracted by the tax provisions of the Technical Amendment Act of 1958 relating to companies organized under the Small Business Investment Act of 1958. All of those tax benefits are related to the stock acquired by the small business investment companies through conversion of convertible debentures. Only a corporation may issue convertible debentures, and the final SBA regulations under the act specifically prohibit a small business investment company from acquiring an equity interest in an unincorporated business.

Under these circumstances it is clear that there is a built-in bias in favor of corporations seeking funds from the new small business investment companies. There are some 4.3 million small businesses in this country, but only 600,000 active corporations, both large and small. Thus, it must be assumed that at least 85 percent of the small businesses in this country are unincorporated. Query: With SBA holding small business investment companies to legal interest rates on straight loans, what inducement is there for a small business investment company to make a long-term loan to a company which presumably is more risky than normal?

Except for the pro bono publico type of company, it is clear that the vast majority of small business investment companies are going to be concentrating their investments in convertible debentures of small corporations. Such investments will give the small business investment company tax-free dividends on conversion into stock and ordinary losses, should they be incurred by the small business investment company on stock acquired through conversion.

The amendment of section 243 of the 1954 code granting small business investment companies a 100 percent dividends-received deduction actually gives them a 15-point advantage over conventional corporations which already receive an 85 percent dividends-received deduction. It is submitted that in order to counterbalance this built-in bias in favor of corporate borrowers, some provision be made for a tax deduction on a portion of the interest received by a small business investment company on long-term loans. For example, 15 percent of the interest received by a small business investment company on long-term loans could be tax exempt, thus counterbalancing the 15-point advantage which will be enjoyed by small business investment companies on dividends received on stock acquired through the conversion of convertible debentures. It would be reasonable to expect that such an advantage would encourage small business investment companies to make long-term loans to the more than 85 percent of small businesses which are unincorporated.

Proposed solution

Add a new section 249 to subtitle A, chapter 1B, part VIII, Internal Revenue Code of 1954, to read as follows:

"SEC. 249. Deduction for a portion of interest received by small business investment companies.

"(a) Amount of deduction.—In the case of a small business investment company operating under the Small Business Investment Act of 1958, there shall be allowed as a deduction an amount equal to 15 percent of the interest received on long-term loans made pursuant to section 305 of the Small Business Investment Act of 1958."

ACCUMULATING EARNINGS TAX

Problem

Many potential investors in small business investment companies have been concerned about the possible imposition of the accumulated earnings tax under section 531 of the 1954 Internal Revenue Code.

It is submitted that this tax should not apply to small business investment companies so long as their accumulated earnings are reinvested in long-term loans or equity investments as provided under the Small Business Investment Act of 1958. Efforts to obtain assurances from the Internal Revenue Service that section 531 will not apply where earnings are reinvested have been unavailing to date.

While this problem should not be acute for small business investment companies, at least during the early years of their operations, potential investors want to know now whether the companies will ever be subject to the section 531 tax, and it is submitted that they are entitled to know. In light of the reluctance of the Internal Revenue Service to commit itself on this question, it appears that legislation is in order.

Proposed solution

Amend section 532(b) of the 1954 Internal Revenue Code by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(4) A small business investment company organized and licensed by the Small Business Administration under the Small Business Investment Act of 1958, provided 90 percent of its accumulated earnings and profits are invested as authorized by said act."

EXPANSION OF SPECIAL SCHOOL MILK PROGRAM

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to expand the special school milk program.

The proposed legislation, establishing the special milk program on a permanent basis, would provide that for years following fiscal 1959, $85 million, instead of the present $75 million, would be provided for the special milk program.

Over the years the school milk program has tremendously improved the health of our schoolchildren, as well as added supplemental nourishment to the diets of those in nursery schools, child care centers, settlement houses, summer camps, and similar nonprofit institutions devoted to the care and training of children.

The record in our Nation's schools is particularly impressive. In fiscal year 1958, for example, over 4,385 schools and child-care institutions in Wisconsin served more than 74.5 million half pints of milk. Nationally, 76,478 such institutions served more than 1.9 billion half pints of milk.

According to reports, the program for fiscal year 1958 is running ahead of the previous year.

In addition to this splendid record of improving the health of the Nation's boys and girls, this program has provided an excellent outlet for surplus milk in a great many communities.

I respectfully urge our colleagues on the Agriculture Committee to consider this as soon as possible, so that favorable consideration can be given by the Congress at an early date.

I request unanimous consent to have the bill printed at this point in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 982) to increase and extend the special milk program for children, introduced by Mr. WILEY, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the first sentence of Public Law 85–478 (72 Stat. 276) is amended to read as follows: "That for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1959, not to exceed $75,000,000, and for each fiscal year thereafter not to exceed $85,000,000, of the funds of the Commodity Credit Corporation shall be used to increase the consumption of fluid milk by children (1) in nonprofit schools of high-school grade and under; and (2) in nonprofit nursery schools, child-care centers, settlement houses, summer camps, and similar nonprofit institutions devoted to the care and training of children."

DESIGNATION OF LINCOLN'S BIRTHDAY AS A LEGAL HOLIDAY

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I introduce for myself and the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] two bills to establish Lincoln's birthday as a legal holiday in the District of Columbia and in Federal offices throughout the Nation. I ask unanimous consent that the bills may lie on the table until February 12, in order that additional Senators might join in their sponsorship.

The United States is this year commemorating the sesquicentennial of Lincoln's birth in 1809, in accordance with legislation enacted by Congress. It was truly stated of our great Civil War President, on his passing, that "Lincoln is now for the ages." It is in this spirit that we should now annually mark his birth date and rededicate ourselves to the principles for which he stood.

Now, almost a century after Lincoln's death, the wounds and sectional schisms of the Civil War have largely healed; Lincoln belongs to the entire Nation, to the entire American people, and should be so honored. His rise to national leadership from humble beginnings has come to symbolize the American dream.

His warmth of spirit, his deep concern for his fellow man, his gentle humor, and the high principles for which he labored and died have served equally to inspire the peoples of the world as it has done our own people. Lincoln, the 16th President, is the hero of all the free peoples; a beloved symbol internationally of the American spirit of equality and fair play. Lincoln's memory should have this further recognition in his native land.

Lincoln's devotion to liberty for the individual and to obtaining for him political equality and equality of opportunity are well known. His efforts at conciliation with the South, his plans to bring the blessings of liberty and its enjoyment to all Americans, and his plans to reunite the American people were unhappily cut short by an assassin's bullet.

President Lincoln bespoke the spirit which moves many of us today when he stated in his second inaugural address:

> With malice toward none; with charity for all; with firmness in the right, as God gives us to see the right, let us strive to finish the work we are in.

He was a man whose principles called for the support of measured progress in the field of freedom for the individual with which he is most closely identified by history. It is our fervent hope that this measured progress may continue in the same spirit which he—and many of his southern countrymen such as Gen. Robert E. Lee—would have had it continue.

While Congress does not establish national holidays, it is empowered to legislate in this regard for the District of Columbia and for Federal offices. The nine holidays already established by the Congress are New Year's Day, Inauguration Day (every 4 years), George Washington's Birthday, Memorial Day, Independence Day, Labor Day, Veterans Day, Thanksgiving Day, and Christmas Day.

I hope that enactment by Congress of the proposed legislation will set the example for the 18 States which do not observe February 12 as a legal holiday.

The bills are cosponsored by the distinguished junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], in whose State Lincoln made his home, and from which he came to the Presidency of the United States.

By establishing Lincoln's birthday as a legal holiday Congress would to the limit of its powers be setting an example to the States which have not so honored Lincoln.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bills will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bills will lie on the desk, as requested by the Senator from New York.

The bills, introduced by Mr. JAVITS (for himself and Mr. DIRKSEN), were received, read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated:

To the Committee on the District of Columbia:

S. 985. A bill to make Abraham Lincoln's birthday a holiday in the District of Columbia for the purpose of certain laws relating to negotiable instruments, and laws relating to the payment of additional compensation for holiday work by members of the Metropolitan Police Force and the Fire Department of the District of Columbia.

To the Committee on the Judiciary:

S. 986. A bill making the birthday of Abraham Lincoln a legal holiday.

AMENDMENT OF RAILROAD RETIREMENT ACT OF 1937 AND RELATED ACTS

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, last year I introduced Senate bill 1313, a railroad retirement and unemployment insurance bill. The bill passed the Senate, but failed to come to a vote in the House in the closing days of the last session of Congress, because of a parliamentary procedural difficulty.

This year I reintroduced the bill, which is now before the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. I refer to Senate bill 226.

Last year I also introduced, by request, on behalf of the Association of American Railroads, a bill proposed by the railroad carriers, which was considered by the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. I have the honor of being chairman of the Subcommittee on Railroad Retirement.

This morning Mr. Daniel Loomis, the very able president of the Association of American Railroads, asked me if I would again, by request, introduce the bill proposed by the Association of American Railroads, to be accompanied by a statement in explanation of the bill submitted by Mr. Loomis as president of the Association of American Railroads.

As chairman of the Railroad Retirement Subcommittee of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, I am delighted to introduce this bill at the request of the association, and I assure the association that its introduction is no pro forma matter with me.

I send the bill to the desk and ask that it be appropriately referred and printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks, together with the statement of explanation submitted by Mr. Loomis.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill, together with the explanatory statement, will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 987), to amend the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937, the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, the Internal Revenue Code, the Social Security Act, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. MORSE, by request, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PART III—AMENDMENTS TO THE RAILROAD UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

Definitions of base year and benefit year

SEC. 301. Section 1(m) of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act is amended to read as follows:

"(m) The term 'benefit year' with respect to any individual means the period of three hundred and sixty-five consecutive days beginning with the first day of the first registration period after June 30, 1959, with respect to which the individual first files a valid claim for benefits, and thereafter the period of three hundred and sixty-five days beginning with the first day of the first registration period with respect to which the individual next files a valid claim for benefits after the termination of his last preceding benefit year. Any claim for benefits made in accordance with section 5(a) shall be deemed to be a 'valid claim' for the purposes of this subsection if the individual is with respect to his base period a 'qualified employee' as defined in section 3 with respect to his base year."

Section 1(n) of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"(n) The term 'base year' means the twelve completed calendar months immediately preceding the first day of the individual's benefit year."

Definition of "qualified employee"

SEC. 302. Section 3 of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. An individual shall be a 'qualified employee' if the Board finds that his compensation with respect to his base year will have been not less than an amount equal to the product of eighty-seven and his daily wage computed pursuant to section 2(a), and that during his base year more than five calendar months will have been months of service used in computing his years of service for purposes of the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937, and more than one of such months of service shall have been in the last half of such base year.

"No individual who, since earning substantial compensation has received one hundred and thirty daily unemployment benefits, or exhausted his unemployment benefit rights, shall be a 'qualified employee' with respect to further unemployment benefits until he has again earned substantial compensation, and no individual who, since earning substantial compensation has received one hundred and thirty daily sickness benefits or exhausted his sickness benefit rights, shall be a qualified employee with respect to further sickness benefits until he has again earned substantial compensation. As used in the preceding sentence, 'substantial compensation' means compensation in an amount not less than the product of twenty and the amount of the individual's last daily benefit."

SEC. 303. Clauses (i) and (ii) of section 2(a) of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act are each amended by striking out "seven" and inserting "nine" in lieu thereof, and by inserting after the phrase "the same benefit year," the following: "if in such registration period or in the fourteen days immediately prior thereto he had not less than seven days of unemployment".

Benefit computation and limitations

SEC. 304. Section 2(a) of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act is amended by striking out the second sentence thereof, including the schedule, and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "The daily benefit rate of any qualified employee shall be an amount equal to 60 per centum of the daily rate of compensation after withholding taxes, for the employee's last employment in which he engaged for an employer in the base year, but not to exceed $3.50 and if such daily benefit rate so computed is less than $8.50 and is not an even multiple of ten cents it shall be increased to the next highest multiple of ten cents. For purposes of the preceding sentence, an employee's daily rate of compensation after withholding taxes shall be, as determined by the Board, such employee's daily rate after reduction by the amount equal to the sum of—

"(1) the amount equal to the same percentage of such daily pay rate as shall be imposed by sections 3201 and 3251 of the Internal Revenue Code on compensation at the time of such last employment, and

"(2) the amount equal to one-fifth the amount which shall be required to be withheld at the time of such last employment by section 3402(c) of such Code on a weekly pay period basis, on wages paid in a weekly pay period in an amount equal to the product of five and such daily rate."

Disqualifying conditions

Section 4(a–1)(ii) of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act is amended by adding after "Social Security Act, or" the following: "except on days he is involuntarily unemployed due to lack of work, he meets the qualifying work and the age or disability requirements for full annuity payments, pensions or benefits under one or both of such Acts and upon applying therefor could receive them, and any day in any period with respect to which the Board finds that he is receiving or will have received". Such section is further amended by striking out the colon preceding the words "Provided further" and striking out the remainder of this section after the colon and preceding the semicolon at the end thereof.

Section 4 (a–2)(iii) of such Act is amended by striking out ", and the Board finds that such strike was commenced in violation of the provisions of the Railway Labor Act or in violation of the established rules and practices of a bona fide labor organization of which he was a member".

"(iv) any of the days beginning with the day with respect to which the Board finds that he was discharged or suspended for misconduct connected with his work and ending with the fourth calendar week with respect to each of which the Board finds he shall have earned compensation of not less than $25.

"(v) any of the days which the Board finds is in a maternity period of the employee."

After section 4(a–2) of such Act the following is added:

"(a–3) there shall not be considered a day of sickness with respect to any employee—

"(i) any day which is a Sunday or which the Board finds is generally observed as a holiday in the locality in which he registered for such day, unless such day was immediately preceded by a day of unemployment or sickness and immediately followed by a day of unemployment or sickness or was the last day in a registration period and was immediately preceded by a day of unemployment or sickness: Provided, That if two or more consecutive days are a Sunday and one or more holidays, then with respect to any employee neither shall be considered as days of sickness unless they were immediately preceded by a day of unemployment or sickness and immediately followed by a day of unemployment or sickness, or the last of such days was the last day of a registration period and such days were immediately preceded by a day of unemployment or sickness.

"(ii) any day which is disregarded as a day of unemployment of the employee as determined by the Board pursuant to sections 4(a–2)(i) through (vi).

"(iii) any day which is in a maternity period unless the Board finds that sickness on such day is unrelated to the normal consequences of pregnancy or childbirth.

"(iv) any of the days which the Board finds to have occurred more than ninety days after the last day with respect to which the individual will have earned compensation, excluding from such ninety days any period beginning before the expiration thereof with respect to which the Board finds he was unemployed due to a stoppage of work described in section 4(a–1)(iii) and excluding any registration period which begins, or any continuous registration periods the first of which begins before the expiration of such ninety days. For purposes of the preceding sentence a 'registration period' shall be deemed continuous with the preceding registration period if established within ten days after the last day of such preceding period."

The statement presented by Mr. MORSE, in behalf of Mr. Loomis, president of the Association of American Railroads, is as follows:

PROPOSALS TO ALTER THE RAILROAD RETIREMENT AND UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE SYSTEMS

The standard railway labor organizations again are sponsoring legislation which would make sweeping changes in the railroad retirement and unemployment insurance systems. The important bills, which are identical, are S. 226, by Senator MORSE, of Oregon, and H.R. 1012, by Congressman HARRIS, of Arkansas. The bills are substantially the same as S. 1313 in the form in which it passed the Senate on August 22, 1958, as an amendment to H.R. 12728, a bill amending the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act. H.R. 12728 (and its amendment, S. 1313) did not reach the floor of the House of Representatives prior to adjournment of the 85th Congress.

Hearings have been set before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce on H.R. 1012 and before the Morse subcommittee of the Senate Labor Committee.

S. 226 and H.R. 1012 would provide substantial increases in the benefits paid under both the retirement and unemployment systems and also greatly increase the taxes paid to support those systems. Briefly, some of the important features are: All annuities under the retirement system would be increased by 10 percent and benefits under the unemployment system from 8 percent to 25 percent with a general advance of 20 percent. The period of time over which a railroad worker could receive unemployment benefits would be extended for as long as 26 weeks beyond the period provided for at the present time. The bills would increase the tax rate paid by employers and employees each from the present 6¼ percent to 6¾ percent on January 1, 1959. In addition, the retirement tax rate would go to 7½ percent on January 1, 1962, and in a number of steps would eventually reach 9 percent on January 1, 1969. The unemployment insurance tax rate which is now 3 percent would be increased to 3½ percent. Both the new retirement tax rate and the unemployment tax rate would be applied to $400 a month of employee earnings rather than $350 of such earnings, the present tax base. These retirement and unemployment tax changes would impose on the railroads immediate payroll tax increases of $102 million per year, and when the future changes have taken place the additional annual taxes will total $228 million.

In the past year Congress has manifested real concern over what has been called the deteriorating condition of the railroad industry. Enactment of the Transportation Act of 1958 was an important step in the direction of curing some of the railroad problems. Congress obviously was aware that even though that act became the law, many difficulties still confront the railroad industry. This is evidenced by the adoption of Senate Resolution 303, providing for a comprehensive study of transportation policy and related problems. Obviously the railroads are in no position to absorb unwarranted costs. While no dollar amount can be placed on the recently enacted legislation, it is certain that its benefits, insofar as the immediate future is concerned, will be more than nullified by the increased taxes imposed by H.R. 1012 or S. 226.

In the hearings on H.R. 1012 and S. 226 the railroads will offer a proposal which would make a number of changes in both the retirement and unemployment insurance systems. It will be the railroads' position that they are ready to accept some liberalization in benefits paid under the retirement system together with certain retirement tax increases, provided favorable consideration is given to amending the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act to remove certain of the deficiencies and inequities which exist under present law. The railroads' proposal will be that the Railroad Retirement Act be amended so as to provide a 5-percent increase in benefits. Such an increase would provide, in dollar amounts paid to beneficiaries, a larger increase than the 7-percent increase in benefits which the 85th Congress provided for workers covered by the general social-security system. This would be true either with respect to the maximum annuities available under the Railroad Retirement Act and the Social Security Act or with respect to the average annuities awarded under those two acts.

In 1956 Congress passed, and the President signed, a bill granting a 10-percent increase in railroad-retirement benefits. The 10-percent increase in benefits was sought by the standard railway-labor organizations. The 5-percent increase now proposed by the railroads would be 5 percent on top of that 10-percent increase. While the 1956 legislation provided no tax increase to pay the costs of the 10-percent increase in benefits, the President signed the bill with the understanding that provision would be made in the future to pay those increased costs. In the 1957 hearings on retirement and unemployment legislation the railroads stated that they were ready to assume their share of the cost of that 10-percent benefit increase. The railroads' proposal accordingly provides an increase in retirement taxes which would pay for that 10-percent increase and, in addition, would pay for a substantial part of the additional 5-percent increase in benefits. This would be done by increasing the retirement tax rate from 6¼ to 6¾ percent with employers and employees each paying that rate. Further, that new tax rate would be applied to $400 a month of employee earnings rather than to $350 a month, the present tax base. The increase to $400 in the tax base would be in line with the 1958 amendments to the Social Security Act. Increased retirement taxes under the railroads' proposal would amount to slightly less than $120 million a year. The increased tax burden on the carriers is one which the industry would be hard pressed to bear. However, it stands ready to assume that burden providing that Congress will revise the railroad unemployment-insurance system to cure a number of substantial defects in that system.

The railroads' proposal contains the following suggestions for change in the unemployment and sickness insurance system:

Base year and benefit year: Under present law, in the calculation of unemployment and sickness benefits the base year is the calendar year and the benefit year is the succeeding fiscal year. Thus, an employee with work in 2 consecutive calendar years can draw 6 months' benefits in 1 fiscal year and another 6 months' benefits in the succeeding fiscal year, or 1 year's benefits for a single period of unemployment. The bill would make the base year the 12 months immediately preceding the month in which benefits are first payable.

"Qualified employees": Under present law, all an employee needs to do to qualify for benefits is to earn $400 in his base year. The bill would require him to earn at least 87 times his daily rate of pay—the equivalent to working at least one-third of the year. He would also have to earn wages in each of 6 months, at least 2 of which would have to be in the second half of the base year.

Waiting period: While State laws pay no benefits for the first week of unemployment, the railroad system pays 2 days of the first week. The bill would conform the railroad system to the State system waiting period.

Benefit computation and limitations: Under the present law, daily benefit rates run from $3.50 to $8.50, depending upon the compensation earned in the base year. The schedule is largely a dead letter as present law provides that a man should be paid one-half his last daily rate of pay (but not to exceed $8.50) if this is higher than the benefit under the schedule. The bill would wipe out the schedule and would have everyone draw benefits equal to 60 percent of his pay after tax withholdings. The worker with dependents would therefore draw greater benefits than the single worker even though their basic railroad pay was the same.

Existing law permits the railroad worker to draw both unemployment and sickness benefits equal to compensation earned in his base year. The bill, in line with many State statutes, would limit unemployment benefits to one-third of such compensation and would similarly limit sickness benefits.

Disqualifying conditions: Under present law, strikers and those fired for cause can collect benefits immediately after leaving work. Those who voluntarily quit and those who refuse to accept jobs are disqualified for 30 days. The bill would disqualify all of these classes. However, strikers could collect benefits at the termination of the strike if there was lack of work. The other classes would have to go back to work and work for at least 4 weeks before qualifying for benefits for subsequent unemployment.

Women now receive benefits during the maternity period. Under the bill, no maternity benefits would be paid, no unemployment benefits would be paid during the maternity period and sickness benefits would be paid only if the sickness was not related to maternity.

Under present law, a person disqualified from receiving unemployment benefits can still collect sickness benefits during that period. Under the bill, no sickness benefits would be paid under those circumstances.

Under present law, persons who have not been employed in railroad work for a long period of time (as much as more than a year) on becoming sick can collect sickness benefits. Under the bill a person who goes more than 90 days after his last railroad work without claiming sickness benefits would be disqualified from thereafter receiving them.

Day of sickness: Under existing law a person must be available for work to qualify for unemployment benefits, but he may draw sick benefits even if he is not available for work. The bill would make sickness benefits payable only to employees who would have been available except for sickness.

Employer-employee financing of sickness benefits: Sickness benefits are part of the unemployment sickness benefit program and are paid for entirely by the railroads. Only four States have sickness insurance systems and their benefits are paid for primarily by the employees. The bill would establish a special fund to finance the payment of sickness benefits for railroad employees and it would impose a one-half of 1 percent payroll tax on employees, which with an equal amount of taxes from the employers, would be paid into this special fund and used solely to finance the sickness program. The one-half of 1 percent payroll tax on the employers would come from the tax paid presently for unemployment and sickness purposes.

Taxes: While the railroads' proposal would change the taxable base under the retirement system from $350 to $400, there is no occasion to change the present base of $350 under the railroad unemployment insurance system. The State unemployment systems with few exceptions provide for a taxable base of $250 a month and only in Alaska is the tax base as high as the present railroad tax base. There is also no occasion to change the tax rate—now at a maximum of 3 percent.

Mr. MORSE. I wish the record to show that this bill offered by the Association of American Railroads, will receive thorough hearing and consideration by my subcommittee; and I serve notice now on all parties to the hearing, including the railroad brotherhoods, that we shall expect the witnesses coming before my subcommittee to be prepared to be cross-examined, not only on my bill, Senate bill 226, but also the carriers' bill.

AMENDMENT OF PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE ACT, RELATING TO PROTECTION AGAINST UNSANITARY MILK AND MILK PRODUCTS

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and Senators McCARTHY, PROXMIRE, and WILEY, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the Public Health Service Act to protect the public from unsanitary milk and milk products shipped in interstate commerce, without unduly burdening such commerce.

This bill represents a complete revision of S. 2727 and H.R. 7794, both introduced in 1957. Briefly, those bills involved the following:

First. Provided that, after a specified period of time, 1 year from date of enactment of the bill, all fluid milk and fluid milk products moving in interstate commerce must meet the requirements of the current milk ordinance and code recommended by the U.S. Public Health Service.

Second. Wrote into law the relevant provisions of the current United States Code.

Third. Provided that, after the effective date of the act, no milk meeting the requirements of the U.S. Public Health Service Code could be excluded from any State or municipality by virtue of sanitation regulations, practices, and the like different from those specified in the United States Code.

Fourth. Defined interstate commerce as commerce between the States and commerce which affects such commerce.

Hearings were held on H.R. 7794 before the Science and Education Subcommittee of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in April 1958. There was considerable opposition to the bill:

First. On the part of local and State sanitation officials who thought that the bill would strip them of their authority and responsibilities in respect to quality control of milk supplies coming into their jurisdictions.

Second. Fluid milk cooperative associations who argued that their milk was better than U.S. Public Health Service milk.

Third. Alleged high costs of administration of the law if enacted.

After the hearings, the Association of State and Territorial Health Officers and the conference of State sanitary engineers reviewed the entire situation in respect to this matter, and as a result a report was adopted at the annual convention of the Association of State and Territorial Health Officers held in Washington, D.C., October 24 to 28, 1958, which set forth the recommendations of this association as to the principles it recommends in respect to Federal milk sanitation legislation.

The bill which we are introducing today has been drafted, taking into full account the recommendations of the Association of State and Territorial Health Officers and the criticisms that were voiced at the hearings.

Unlike the previous bill, S. 2727, the current bill does not require that all fluid milk and fluid milk products shipped in interstate commerce, or which affects such interstate commerce, must meet the requirements of the U.S. Public Health Service recommended milk ordinance and code. If States and municipalities desire to accept milk for consumption as fluid milk and fluid milk products which has not been qualified under the United States Code, they are at liberty to do so.

However, the bill provides that, as a matter of principle, while recognizing that the primary responsibility for sanitary control of fluid milk rests with the State and local governments, no State or local government has the right to obstruct the free movement in interstate commerce of milk and milk products of high sanitary quality by use of unnecessary sanitary requirements or other health measures.

Thus, the bill provides that no local or State government can prohibit or limit the entry of milk which does meet United States Code requirements into the markets over which they have jurisdiction.

The bill provides methods of administration through State plans, development of standard methods of inspection and the like by the Surgeon General of the United States, and permits local and State health authorities to exercise the same authority over sanitation of United States Code milk after it arrives in the market as it exercises over intrastate milk. Thus, if a local ordinance requires milk to be pasteurized, for example, before distribution to the consumer, milk shipped interstate under the code would be required to be pasteurized also before distribution. These are safeguards to sanitation of milk through to the consumer that are properly vested in local and State governments.

The bill also provides administrative and enforcement provisions, permits research in health problems by the Surgeon General, sets forth the manner of listing plants which meet the requirements of the United States Code, provides the manner in which plants may be removed from the approved shipping list published by the Surgeon General, and the like.

We believe that this bill fully meets the principles recommended by the Association of State and Territorial Health Officers as to Federal milk sanitation legislation and will eliminate the widely prevalent use of sanitation regulations as economic barriers to the flow of high quality milk and milk products in interstate commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 988) to amend the Public Health Service Act to protect the public from unsanitary milk and milk products shipped in interstate commerce, without unduly burdening such commerce, introduced by Mr. HUMPHREY (for himself, Mr. MCCARTHY, Mr. PROXMIRE, and Mr. WILEY), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I am very happy to cosponsor again this year the bill introduced by the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] to provide for the establishment of a national milk sanitation code.

A very similar bill was before the last Congress. The bill by Senator HUMPHREY, which I cosponsored, was identical to a companion bill in the House of Representatives by Congressman LESTER JOHNSON, a member of the Committee on Agriculture of that House and an outstanding representative of dairy farmers.

This bill provides that any milk which meets the requirements of a Federal milk sanitation code cannot be excluded from any State or from any fluid milk market in the United States. State or local health authorities, under this bill, will still inspect out-of-State supplies of milk which are not qualified under the U.S. milk sanitation code, if they so desire. But they cannot disqualify and prevent the entry of milk which does meet the requirements of this code.

Mr. President, this bill does not take away from local and State authorities the right to establish and maintain standards to govern the quality of milk produced and consumed in local markets. This was one of the chief objections to the bill in its previous form. That objection has been removed.

But certainly, Mr. President, it is none too early to establish a uniform standard of sanitation and handling practices to protect the public health against the uncertainty arising from multifold rules and regulations which now apply to the interstate movement of milk. This bill will establish such a standard. It will provide an important safeguard to consumers.

There is no more truly universal food than fluid milk. Practically every person in the United States consumes milk. Milk is produced in every State in the Union. When we drink milk—whether from Wisconsin, Florida, California, or Colorado—we should be assured that it is of a dependable and uniform minimum quality. This bill will give consumers this assurance.

Enactment of this bill will also lift the real and the psychological barriers that have been raised against the free movement of milk from areas of surplus production—including Wisconsin, Minnesota, and other great dairy States—to the areas of shortage in the large population centers. It will enable consumers who live far from America's dairyland—my own State of Wisconsin—to be absolutely confident of the quality of milk purchased from Wisconsin sources, as well as others outside of the State in which it is consumed.

This bill will help to expand the total market for milk, as well as to enable Wisconsin producers to have access to markets outside of our State if they can meet the national milk sanitation standards. By eliminating duplication and confusion in the standards applied to milk in interstate commerce, it will encourage greater economy in the handling and marketing of milk, to the benefit of producers and consumers alike.

Mr. President, dairy producers in Wisconsin strongly favor this bill. They are confident that they can meet the sanitation standards which will be established by the Public Health Service under provisions of this bill. I have a letter from State Senator Lynn E. Stalbaum, secretary-treasurer of the Racine Milk Producers Cooperative Association of Racine, Wis., which reads as follows:

FEBRUARY 2, 1959.

Senator WILLIAM PROXMIRE,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR PROXMIRE: Enclosed is a copy of a resolution adopted at our annual meeting last month regarding uniform milk inspection. We have heard that legislation of the type we support will be considered by this session of Congress.

It is hoped that you will keep the views of our members in mind when this matter is before you.

Sincerely yours,

LYNN E. STALBAUM,
Secretary-Treasurer.

The resolution referred to by State Senator Stalbaum is as follows:

RESOLUTION ADOPTED AT THE ANNUAL MEETING OF THE RACINE MILK PRODUCERS COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATION, JANUARY 12, 1959

One of the great restrictions on the movement of Wisconsin milk is the difference in health inspection on various markets. Many are designed to limit the area from which milk can be obtained. Others cause a considerable duplication of inspection for the producer and the handler.

We favor a uniform system of milk inspection. We support all legislation which would create uniform inspection based on U.S. Public Health standards, and which would limit local health regulations to these standards.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I am pleased to join as a cosponsor of the legislation for establishing uniform milk sanitation standards.

We, in Wisconsin—the largest milk producing State in the Nation—have long felt that there have been barriers to the transportation of our high quality milk into other consuming areas; and that these barriers, to a degree, have been created by the wide variety of sanitation standards that exist throughout the country.

I am, therefore, hopeful that the adoption of more uniform standards would enable more consumers in the Nation to have access to our high-grade Wisconsin milk.

We recognize, of course, that there may be need for further improvements in the bill. I am hopeful, however, that our colleagues in the Agriculture Committee will find it possible to give this much-needed measure early consideration.

I am pleased to point out that the objectives of the bill have the endorsement of a number of fine farm groups, and other authoritative organizations in the field of agriculture, including the Wisconsin Association of Cooperatives, Wisconsin Council of Agricultural Cooperatives, the Farmers Union, the Farm Bureau, the Wisconsin Agriculturist and Farmer, Hoard's Dairyman, and the Racine Milk Producers Cooperative Association.

I request unanimous consent to have messages from these authorities, as well as an editorial from the Wisconsin Agriculturist and Farmer, entitled "Let's Break Down the Barriers Against Wisconsin Milk" printed at this point in the RECORD:

There being no objection, the messages and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RACINE, WIS., February 4, 1959.

Senator ALEXANDER WILEY,
U.S. Senate,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.:

Wisconsin Agriculturist favors Johnson bill to allow free movement of milk in interstate commerce. We are sure Wisconsin milk can meet highest health standards. Especially favor part of bill stating that milk which meets requirements cannot be excluded from any milk market. Health barriers especially in Southern States have hindered disposing of Wisconsin milk. Elimination of these can mean higher milk prices and greater farm income for dairyman. Would appreciate your support of this bill. Believe our thinking is also that of Wisconsin College of Agriculture.

DOUGLAS SORENSON,
Managing Editor, Wisconsin Agriculturist and Farmer.

FORT ATKINSON, WIS., February 5, 1959.

Senator ALEXANDER WILEY,
Senate Office Building:

Reply your wire on H.R. 3840. We do not have bill. Press reports indicate it is good bill for Wisconsin dairymen, eastern and southern farmers will object; facilitates interstate trade. We do not foresee major economic gains for Wisconsin dairymen now, however this point oversold by creamery proponents. Refer our issue May 25, 1958, providing transportation costs are greatest hurdle. State milk order prices are high, but if health barriers wiped out these dairymen will simply scale down their class 1 prices to make certain that they retain their markets. No gain on Midwest but bill's greatest benefit may come when sterile concentrated milk is perfected; prospects for Midwest gain then very good.

We have endorsed the general principles of bill H.R. 3840 as the only method of preventing State and municipal health authorities from discriminating against our out-of-State shipment of milk. Suggest you give H.R. 3840 your full support.

RESOLUTION ADOPTED AT THE ANNUAL MEETING OF THE RACINE MILK PRODUCERS COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATION, JANUARY 12, 1959

One of the great restrictions on the movement of Wisconsin milk is the difference in health inspection on various markets. Many are designed to limit the area from which milk can be obtained. Others cause a considerable duplication of inspection for the producer and the handler.

We favor a uniform system of milk inspection. We support all legislation which would create uniform inspection based on U.S. Public Health standards, and which would limit local health regulations to these standards.

[From the Wisconsin Agriculturist and Farmer, Jan. 17, 1959]

LET'S BREAK DOWN THE BARRIERS AGAINST WISCONSIN MILK

Wisconsin milk constantly runs into health regulation barriers that many States have built around themselves.

Masquerading under the guise of sanitation and health, these regulations are designed to limit the amount of milk available and so maintain a high price to local dairy producers.

We would like to see uniform regulations across the country. Wisconsin dairymen and their leaders have long fought against regulation barriers that keep Wisconsin milk out, even in areas where milk consumption is low.

They have urged Congress to pass legislation which would set nationwide standards for quality milk. Inspection regulations in Wisconsin then would be the same as those in any other State. Wisconsin inspections—having Federal sanction—would qualify across the Nation.

Few people would argue against the sanity of such a program. But getting a law through Congress is quite another matter.

Wisconsin and Minnesota—being milk exporters—are the States that are most interested in getting such a law. But the States working for such a law are few compared to those that enjoy their own little monopolies to keep up the price to local producers.

Senators and Representatives from States that have erected health regulation barriers are not about to see them swept away by Federal action. And so bills that would bring nationwide uniform health inspection laws are sidetracked year after year.

Wisconsin has made real progress in working out reciprocal inspection with neighboring States. Under these arrangements Wisconsin inspections are accepted by these States. This has relieved many producers from duplicate inspection.

As yet we do not have a reciprocal inspection agreement with Michigan. The matter is under consideration. And it looks quite hopeful that the Michigan folks will go along with such an agreement.

We can hope to extend reciprocal inspection to other States. But nationwide reciprocal inspection under uniform regulations—though badly needed—looks pretty far off at present.

It will not come as long as Southern and Eastern States insist on using health regulations as barriers to outside milk.

EXPENDITURE OF CERTAIN SHIP REPAIR FUNDS IN PRIVATE SHIPYARDS

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill which seeks to reduce to minimal proportions Government competition with private industry in the field of ship repairs and in so doing to carry out a recommendation of the Hoover Commission. This bill is identical to Senate bill 3426 which I introduced in the last session.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the text of the bill, together with a memorandum prepared by me, and pertinent correspondence relating to this subject matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill, memorandum, and correspondence will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 989) to require the expenditure of 75 percent of the funds expended for the conversion, alteration, and repair of naval vessels to be expended with private ship-repair yards, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. BUTLER, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Armed Services, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, notwithstanding any other provision of law, not less than 75 per centum of the funds hereafter obligated for expenditure by the Department of the Navy during any fiscal year for the conversion, alteration, and repair of naval vessels, other than such conversion, alteration, and repair not ordinarily conducted in shipyards, shall be obligated for expenditure with private ship repair yards.

SEC. 2. There is hereby established a temporary commission to be known as the National Commission on Shipbuilding (hereinafter referred to as the "Commission"), which shall be composed of nine members to be appointed by the President. Each member shall be appointed from private life and shall have had no connection with the United States Navy or with the private shipbuilding and repair industry.

SEC. 3. It shall be the duty of the Commission to make a thorough study and investigation of the effect on the private shipbuilding and repair industry of the construction and repair of naval vessels in Government shipyards. The Commission shall complete its study and investigation and make a report of its findings and recommendations to the President and the Congress not later than one year after the date of approval of this Act. Upon the submission of such report the Commission shall cease to exist.

SEC. 4. Each member of the Commission shall receive $50 per diem when engaged in the actual performance of duties vested in the Commission, plus reimbursement for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred by him in the performance of such duties.

SEC. 5. (a) The Commission or, on the authorization of the Commission, any subcommittee or member thereof, may for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this Act, hold such hearings and sit and act at such times and places as the Commission or such subcommittee or member may deem advisable.

(b) The Commission may secure directly from any executive department or agency of the Federal Government information, suggestions, estimates, and statistics for the purposes of this Act; and each such Department or Agency may furnish such information, suggestions, estimates, and statistics directly to the Commission, upon request made by the chairman or vice chairman.

SEC. 6. (a) The Commission shall have power to appoint and fix the compensation of such personnel as it deems advisable, without regard to the provisions of the civil service laws and the Classification Act of 1949, as amended.

(b) The Commission may procure, without regard to the civil service laws and the Classification Act of 1949, temporary and intermittent services to the same extent as is authorized for the departments by section 15 of the Act of August 2, 1946 (60 Stat. 810), but at rates not to exceed $50 per diem for individuals.

SEC. 7. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act.

The memorandum and correspondence presented by Mr. BUTLER are as follows:

MEMORANDUM BY SENATOR BUTLER

The letter from Captain McCain pertaining to S. 3426 of the 85th Congress reflects the general philosophy of most, but not all, naval officers and civilian executives; that is, that naval repairs, in peacetime, should be primarily accomplished by the naval shipyards to prepare them for their wartime missions. This objective, of course, requires the maintenance of a high level of employment in all the naval shipyards. The Navy usualy attempts to justify that philosophy by statements to the effect that private ship repair yards do not have competent personnel having the specialized skills in ordnance, electronics, and other specialized installations on combat vesesls. This contention, which is of long standing, ignores the fact that many of the combat ships to be repaired were originally constructed in private shipyards, which now are adjudged incompetent to repair their own creations.

Unfortunately, letters of the character of this letter, which comment on proposed legislation, are not always factual, perhaps by inadvertence on the part of both the preparer and the signer.

The shipbuilding industry, as such, has not complained about the assignment of new construction by the Navy to private shipyards. On the contrary, it has repeatedly expressed its appreciation to the Navy for the allocation of substantial new construction work, both auxiliary and combat ships, to private shipyards.

It is quite true that the ship repairing portion of the industry, which consists both of shipbuilding yards having repair facilities and ship repair yards devoted exclusively to that type of work, has received substantial naval repair work, particularly on auxiliaries, but to a limited extent on combat vessels, together with some conversions. The industry is duly appreciative of the work it has received. However, it feels that it could receive substantially more work of this type without the dire results to the naval shipyards predicted in Captain McCain's letter.

Present employment ceilings in the several naval shipyards are maintained at an unduly high level. Thus it is inevitable that work will be assigned to those same naval shipyards in sufficient volume to provide work for those employed there so as to justify their employment. This procedure creates the old problem of the chicken and the egg, although in this case the employment seems to come first and then the workload, but it could be that the potential workload envisioned or planned determines the employment ceiling. In any event, the result is the same, too much employment in naval shipyards and too little in private ship repair yards.

This opinion is reinforced by statistics on relative employment in the naval shipyards and private ship repair yards, prewar and postwar. The prewar pattern disappeared with the war and was never reestablished after the war. The private ship repair yards were forced by economic conditions after the war to cut back heavily in employment. The same pressure did not apply to the naval shipyards which did not cut back nearly to the extent that the private yards were forced to cut back. Thus, on a purely relative basis, the postwar employment in the naval shipyards is proportionately much higher than that in the private shipyards. And, the prewar ratio has accordingly been relegated by the Navy to a thing of the past.

Captain McCain states that, as of January 1, 1958, about 59 percent of the $3,700 million naval ship construction and conversion program was being accomplished in private yards. The Shipbuilders Council of America is unable to check this figure. Published reports, obtained from member yards in the council as of January 1, 1958, show less than half that dollar volume of naval construction under way in such private yards, even allowing generously for small craft construction which would not be included. The amount of naval new construction in private yards is unquestionably substantial.

Captain McCain also states that, during the fiscal years 1954 through 1957, private yards received a yearly average of $100 million of naval repair work. That figure would have more significance if it were also stated as a percentage of total naval repair work. Actually it does not agree with the records of the shipbuilders council which show a yearly average of naval repair work for 1954 through 1957 of slightly under $56 million. For the year 1957 the records of the council show slightly under $37 million, based on returns obtained directly from 54 yards. Some smaller yards might account for some additional naval repair work, but it would not be in any substantial amount.

Incidentally the dollar volume of naval repair work in private yards in 1957 is less than 60 percent of the similar volume for 1956 and by far the lowest of any year since the advent of the Korean war in 1951, which had the effect of greatly increasing the naval repair load in private yards for the duration of that war. However, it must be realized that a specific dollar volume of naval repair work in 1957 could purchase not more than one-half of the volume of repairs that could have been purchased with the same dollar volume 10 years earlier, on account of increased costs plus inflation, which decrease purchasing power. For that reason, a direct comparison of dollar volumes in different years is misleading and it must be realized that the actual dollar volume in 1957 is relatively a greatly inflated one.

It is noted that the chief mission of the naval shipyards is the overhaul and repair of combatant ships, and that the superb material readiness of the fleet, in wartime and peacetime, would not have been possible without the unique support provided by naval shipyards. Without attempting to detract in any way from the very proper function of the naval shipyards, which has been well performed, it might be mentioned that the private ship repair yards had no small part in that same operation and even now are considered by the Navy to be a vital element in their mobilization potential.

Captain McCain states that S. 3426 would dissipate the capabilities of this naval shipyard complex which is strategically dispersed through our coastal areas to provide comprehensive logistics support. This conclusion of Captain McCain's does not necessarily follow. First, it might be pointed out that the private ship repair yards likewise are strategically dispersed throughout our coastal areas and also are competent to provide comprehensive logistics support. Second, an increased allocation of naval repair work to private ship repair yards and the decreased employment in the naval ship repair yards which that would entail (compensated for, of course, by increased employment in the private ship repair yards) would not dissipate the capabilities of the naval shipyard complex. It might even enhance them by permitting better organization of specialized skills and the elimination of much employment of lower caliber.

Whether 75 percent of naval repair work to private ship repair yards is a proper allocation or not I do not know, as I do not know what the present allocation is on a percentage basis. But some increase in allocation certainly could be effected without the closing of several naval shipyards and drastic curtailment in the operations of others.

For example, take a hypothetical naval shipyard with a present employment ceiling of 10,000 men. That yard could be maintained in a well organized condition with a ceiling of 7,500 men or even 5,000 men or less without dissipating the capabilities of that same naval shipyard, and it would be entirely capable of rapid expansion, as and if required, in the event of national emergency or war. The special skills still would be available, as well as the diverse inventory for large combatant ships.

The private ship repair yards successfully contend with the problem of expansion as and when required constantly. Why cannot the naval shipyards? It certainly would tend toward more efficient and more economic operation in the naval shipyards.

Captain McCain's philosophy that in wartime naval shipyards are engaged chiefly in repairing battle-damaged ships is indeed interesting. I take no exception to that statement, but I do take exception to its corollary "while private yards specialize in the mass production of new ships." It ignores completely the distinction between private shipbuilding yards and private ship repair yards. Ship repair yards continue to be ship repair yards in wartime, and they also repair battle-damaged ships. At least they did in World War II, and before that in World War I. Private shipbuilding yards by the same token continue to be shipbuilding yards in wartime, building as many ships as possible, not on a mass production basis, as there is no such thing in respect to seagoing ships, but rather on a multiple ship basis. In addition, many so-called emergency yards are created which build large numbers of duplicate ships, also on a multiple ship basis. Mass production, as that term is used in industry in this country, applies to a very large number of identical products for sale to the general public, produced in a manufacturing plant on a production line setup. That process is not and cannot be applied to seagoing ships. At least it never has been as yet successfully so applied.

It is just as necessary, from the naval and mobilization point of view, to prepare privately owned ship-repair yards for their wartime mission as it is to prepare the naval shipyards for that same mission. It is obvious that, if the privately owned ship-repair yards are to accomplish that wartime mission successfully, they must receive work in peacetime of such character as to enable them to perform properly their wartime mission. The allocation of a greater volume of repair work, particularly on combat vessels, will not necessarily destroy the flexibility which Captain McCain says is necessary, and it certainly will not promote the economic well-being of the private ship-repair industry at the expense of the national security. On the contrary, if applied with discretion, it will promote both the private ship-repair industry and the naval shipyards, and thus the national security.

Whether or not 75 percent or some other percentage of naval repair work be allocated to private ship-repair yards, the Navy could, if it would, allocate a substantially higher percentage of naval repair work to private ship-repair yards than it now does, whatever that percentage, presently unknown, may turn out to be, without causing the closing of several naval shipyards and drastic curtailment in the operations of others.

To predict such closing and curtailment of operations and the consequent impairment of the Navy's ability to provide logistics support to the operating forces and to maintain them in an optimum condition of readiness, as a result of allocating some greater amount of naval repair work to private ship-repair yards is to ignore the facts and realities of the situation.

Actually it will take a positive policy on the part of the Navy to allocate more naval work to private ship-repair yards, rather than the present negative policy that it can't be done for fear of dire results, as well as fear of the alleged incompetency of the private ship-repair yards. Actually also, the present employment ceilings and workloads in the naval shipyards are as much the result of pressures, political and otherwise, as they are the result of concern for the national security. Any time any reduction in naval shipyard personnel ceilings is attempted, that political pressure makes itself immediately and forcibly felt. Furthermore history shows that Government establishments tend to expand rather than contract, for such is human nature.

Captain McCain comments to the effect that any national commission such as contemplated by the bill could not be expected to formulate recommendations within the short space of 1 year that would be of any practical benefit. If that is the case, it would be simple to extend the period to 2 years. As to prejudging of the matter prior to any report and finding by the Commission, in the establishment of an arbitrary 75:25 ratio, let the Navy advise what the present percentage is, let the bill be amended to provide a reasonable interim increase, and then let the Commission determine whether a permanent increase greater in amount than the interim increase is reasonable and in the national interest, both economically wise and security wise.

Some reference is made by Captain McCain to the present policy as having been established by tradition.

It is tradition which must be overcome, and a policy must be determined not on tradition but on the realities of the mobilization base. The Navy's policy on the mobilization base is not consistent with the Navy's policy on the operation of naval shipyards at the expense of the private ship-repair industry. Likewise, the Navy's policy on the high-level operation of naval shipyards is not consistent with the findings and recommendations of the Hoover Commission in respect to competition with private industry.

On a collateral point, involving repairs to 43 naval vessels to be transferred from the reserve fleet to friendly nations, President Eisenhower, in a letter of July 14, assured me that he subscribes to the sound proposition that Government must not compete unfairly with private industry. He states that in recent years the relative growth of private shipbuilding yards has been greater than that of the Navy shipbuilding yards, which is a direct result of application by the administration of the principle in question.

Here again, in the information which has been furnished to the President, is the confusion that is evident in Captain McCain's letter—a failure to differentiate between shipbuilding yards and ship-repair yards. It is the latter which would be involved with respect to the 43 naval vessels in question.

Furthermore, why should there be any growth of Navy shipbuilding yards? That is exactly what the private ship repair industry takes exception to; in fact the industry's efforts made over the years have been directed to curtailment of the present size of the naval shipyards, at least in respect to the employment of personnel and the volume of repair work allocated to such yards.

The President also says he must agree with the Navy that their yards are technically better qualified and more experienced in conversion and repair of combatant ships. The President cannot know this of his own knowledge. He perforce has accepted the Navy's statement to that effect. Private industry does not concede that the naval shipyards are technically better qualified in conversion and repair of combatant ships. The technical qualifications of many of the private yards are of a very high order. If they were not, it must be obvious that the Navy would not allocate to such yards a substantial part of its construction program for new combatant ships. If the naval shipyards are more experienced in conversion and repair of combatant ships, as his letter states, it must be due to the fact that the Navy more or less monopolizes that type of work for its naval shipyards, which it has the power to do. How then can the private ship repair yards be expected to become experienced in the absence of the type of work which they will be called upon to perform in the event of war? What then becomes of the mobilization base upon which the Navy says it will have to rely under war conditions?

AUGUST 6, 1958.

The Honorable RICHARD B. RUSSELL,
Chairman, Committee on Armed Services, U.S. Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR DICK: It is my understanding that the Department of the Navy, in coordination with the Department of Defense, has submitted to the Committee on Armed Services an unfavorable report on my bill, S. 3426.

If the Navy's philosophy, as expressed in Captain McCain's letter of July 8 to you as chairman, were sound then all of the military services should immediately expand their manufacturing and maintenance activities far beyond their present scope. The verbosity of the captain's arguments, and his misleading figures, brings me to the conclusion that this entire matter is deserving of the committee's immediate attention and consideration. The alacrity with which Government bureaus can recite reasons, no matter how tenuous, for inflated expenditures must be a matter of deep concern to you and the members of your committee, as it is to me.

In my considered opinion, the Navy could maintain its yards in an essential state of readiness and maintain such specialized skills and inventories as private industry is unwilling to maintain (if any) with one-fifth its present working force in all of the naval shipyards.

In my letter of March 12, you will recall that I made this statement: "Yet, extensive search of material in the Library of Congress, Government documents, periodicals and other literature, including the files of the Department of the Navy, has failed to show any evidence that there has ever been rendered a unified and systematic account of naval shipyards with respect to their general activities in maintenance and repair. A few facts may be gleaned from naval appropriation hearings. Congressional reports on appropriations sometimes include brief comments on the needs and problems of the Bureau of Ships, which administers the naval shipyards, but do not treat the repair functions of naval shipyards."

On the basis of Captain McCain, I am obliged to conclude that the Department of Navy seeks to preserve the veil of secrecy which has always surrounded the repair functions of naval shipyards. I hope that the Committee on Armed Services will not accept the Navy's self-serving arguments at face value and that it will immediately undertake a series of hearings on S. 3426 for the purpose of lifting this zealously and jealously guarded veil of secrecy.

Once again, may I emphasize that my proposal is not intended to eliminate Government ship repair facilities. Obviously, the yards operated by the Department of the Navy must conserve a nucleus of skilled employees which is capable of expansion in times of emergency. But, I steadfastly believe that such facilities need not be maintained on an elaborate and massive scale when private yards are fully able to handle this type of business at less cost to the Government.

I regard this matter of such importance that I respectfully request that it be considered by the Committee on Armed Services prior to adjournment.

With warm personal regards always, I am,

Sincerely,

JOHN MARSHALL BUTLER,
U.S. Senator.

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D.C., July 8, 1958.

Hon. RICHARD B. RUSSELL,
Chairman, Committee on Armed Services, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Your request for comments on S. 3426, a bill "to require the expenditure of 75 percent of the funds expended for the conversion, alteration, and repair of naval vessels to be expended with private ship repair yards, and for other purposes," has been assigned to this Department by the Secretary of Defense for the preparation of a report thereon expressing the views of the Department of Defense.

S. 3426 would provide that 75 percent of appropriations each fiscal year for the conversion, alteration, and repair of naval vessels, other than such work not ordinarily conducted in shipyards, shall be obligated for expenditure with private ship repair yards. Secondly, the bill would establish a temporary commission of laymen to conduct a thorough and comprehensive investigation, study, and report to the President in not more than 1 year, of the effect upon the private shipbuilding industry of the construction and repair of naval vessels in Government shipyards.

S. 3426 is similar to H.R. 32 and H.R. 3767 of the 1st session, 85th Congress.

The Navy has responded to the need of private yards for additional work by making large-scale assignments of overhaul and repair work, as well as new construction and conversion, to the industry. By its bold and vigorous policy, the Navy has been largely instrumental in preserving the valuable mobilization potential of this industry. In recent years private yards throughout the country have received a larger dollar volume of naval repair work, as well as construction and conversion, than ever before in peacetime. During fiscal years 1954 through 1957, private yards received a yearly average of over $100 million of Navy repair work. Also, as of January 1, 1958, about 59 percent of the $3,700 million naval ship construction and conversion program was being accomplished in private yards.

The chief mission of the naval shipyards is the overhaul and repair of combatant ships. The American tradition of victory at sea is due, in large measure, to the superb material readiness of the fleet in wartime and peacetime, and this in turn, would not have been possible without the unique support provided by naval shipyards, many of which were established early in the 19th century. S. 3426 would dissipate the capabilities of this naval shipyard complex which is strategically dispersed throughout our coastal areas to provide comprehensive logistics support.

The naval shipyards, because of their organization and operation under direct Navy control are immediately responsive to fleet requirements. In wartime especially, this is of paramount importance. Such yards are not subject to strikes and jurisdictional disputes, over which the Navy has little control and which result in loss of timely deliveries. They maintain specialized skills and a diverse inventory of Navy equipment for large combatant ships, particularly ordnance and electronics, which many private yards find it uneconomical to maintain on account of workload fluctuations caused by the uncertainties of competition. In wartime, naval shipyards are engaged chiefly in repairing battle-damaged ships, while private yards specialize in the mass production of new ships. In peacetime therefore, the major part of new construction is generally awarded to private yards and the major part of Navy repair work is undertaken in naval shipyards, in order to prepare both types of yards for their wartime missions.

The distribution of construction conversion and repair work between naval shipyards and private yards must be governed by a very flexible policy, subject to revision to meet changing operational and logistics requirements. Subject bill would destroy this flexibility. It would promote the economic well-being of the private ship repair industry but at considerable sacrifice of national security. The 75 percent requirement would cause the closing of several naval shipyards and drastic curtailment in the operations of others, thus seriously impairing the Navy's ability to provide logistics support to the operating forces and to maintain them in an optimum condition of readiness. These responsibilities require that the Navy retain effective authority to control the overhaul and repair, as well as the operation, of its fighting ships. Such authority is well established by tradition and by existing law.

The subject bill would establish a National Commission on Shipbuilding to be composed of members having no connection with the U.S. Navy or with the private shipbuilding and repair industry. A commission so constituted could not be expected to formulate any recommendations within the short space of 1 year which would be of any practicable benefit. Further, the bill in the establishment of an arbitrary 75:25 ratio appears to indicate a prejudging of the matter prior to any report and finding by the Commission.

In view of the foregoing, the Department of the Navy, on behalf of the Department of Defense, opposes the enactment of S. 3426.

This report has been coordinated within the Department of Defense in accordance with procedures prescribed by the Secretary of Defense.

The Department of the Navy has been advised by the Bureau of the Budget that there is no objection to the submission of this report on S. 3426 to the Congress.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN S. MCCAIN, Jr.,
Captain, U.S. Navy, Chief of Legislative Liaison

MARCH 12, 1958.

The Honorable RICHARD B. RUSSELL,

DEAR DICK: S. 3426, which I introduced on March 10, 1958, has been referred to your committee, and I am therefore taking the liberty of writing you to express the earnest hope that this measure will be scheduled for immediate attention and favorable action. This proposal relates to the conversion to, and repairs of, naval vessels.

Through the enactment of this legislation, Government competition with private enterprise in terms of a vital aspect of our national economy would be curbed. This objective has been recommended by the Hoover Commission, and I believe that little testimony will be needed to demonstrate that, in this instance, a considerable saving in Government expenditures, and an overall improvement in efficiency, can thus be effected.

At the outset, I should like to emphasize that my proposal is not intended to eliminate Government ship repair facilities. Obviously, the yards operated by the Department of the Navy must conserve a nucleus of skilled employees which is capable of expansion in times of emergency. But, I steadfastly believe that such facilities need not be maintained on an elaborate and massive scale when private yards are fully able to handle this type of business.

It is my understanding that overhauls are made every 18 months for some types of naval vessels, every 26 months for others, and more frequently for still others. Records of the House Committee on Appropriations, 85th Congress, 1st session, concerning Department of the Navy Appropriations for 1958, reveal that all the hull, electronics, ordnance, machinery, and other type gear are repaired, reconditioned, or replaced, and more up-to-date equipment is installed in these overhauls. Navy officials in the past have stated the expectation that every ship will be repaired at least once a year, in addition to its regularly scheduled overhaul.

The average age of ships in the fleet, I am informed, is almost 11 years, and is increasing about seven-tenths of a year per annum for the whole fleet. This factor results in increased maintenance requirements.

Yet, extensive search of material in the Library of Congress, Government documents, periodicals and other literature, including the files of the Department of the Navy, has failed to show any evidence that there has ever been rendered a unified and systematic account of naval shipyards with respect to their general activities in maintenance and repair. A few facts may be gleaned from naval appropriation hearings. Congressional reports on appropriations sometimes include brief comments on the needs and problems of the Bureau of Ships, which administers the naval shipyards, but do not treat the repair functions of naval shipyards.

The Public Affairs Information Service Index, the Reader's Guide, the International Index to Periodicals, and the Air University Periodical Index list no articles relevant to the subject. The semiannual reports of the Secretary of Defense give little mention of the matter.

Catalog listings of the books at the Library of Congress and periodical material compiled by the Legislative Reference Service include little, if any, comment that is germane. The Bureau of Ships has stated that the topic has not been the subject of written studies.

The Bureau of Naval Personnel Information Bulletin, All Hands, describes the Portsmouth and Boston yards as "industrial giants" and relates that the Norfolk Naval Yard is typical of the other 10. The Norfolk yard, for example, covers 811 acres, has 30 miles of paved streets, 426 buildings, 44 miles of railroad track, 9 locomotives, 254 cars, 350 cranes and derricks, 2 shipbuilding ways, 7 drydocks, and is capable of drydocking and rendering complete service to the world's largest ships.

Comparative prewar and postwar employment levels in Government owned and privately owned shipyards, according to the Hoover Commission, reveal that from 1930 to 1940 the Government employed 36 percent of all U.S. shipyard workers, and 44 percent during the bleak shipbuilding decline of 1947–50. In October 1954, 51 percent (or 105,900 persons) of all shipyard workers throughout the entire Nation were on navy yard payrolls.

Statistics available to me indicate that the total civilian employees (estimated) in 7 shipyards operated in the continental United States by the Navy as of June 30, 1956, were 62,700. Correspondingly, as of the same date, there were employed in 17 private major shipyards contributing to the Maritime Administration mobilization base 11,253 persons, and the total employment in all private ship repair firms holding Maritime Administration master repair contracts was 35,606.

One of the reasons for the intensive operation of Government yards is traceable to the Vinson-Trammell Act of 1934 which, in part, provides that "* * * the first and each succeeding alternative vessel * * " of each type of ship specified and their replacement shall be built by the Government. The Subcommittee on Business Enterprises of the Hoover Commission found that the situation this 1934 act was designed to remedy has been reversed to the detriment of privately owned yards. In the words of the Commission report: " * * the subcommittee considered that the Navy's operation of all of these 10 shipyards represents a destructive intrusion into the private shipbuilding industry of this country."

To foster free enterprise has long been the national policy. It is, therefore, not illogical to expect that the unfair and nonessential competition of Government in the shipbuilding and ship-repair industries will soon be eliminated. Unquestionably, the national security dictates that the Government must engage in a certain amount of shipbuilding and ship-repair activity, but the extent to which this pursuit is maintained should be a matter of great concern to the Congress and all citizens interested in the economical management of the Government.

Favorable and prompt consideration of S. 3426 by the Committee on Armed Services will therefore be greatly appreciated.

With warm personal regards always, I am,

Sincerely,

JOHN MARSHALL BUTLER,
U.S. Senator.

COMPACTS BETWEEN THE STATES TO PROVIDE FOR UNIFORM TAX TREATMENT OF NONRESIDENTS

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill granting the consent of Congress to the several States to enter into compacts providing for the uniform tax treatment of nonresidents. For years New Jersey commuters have complained about the income taxes they have had to pay if they work in New York or in Philadelphia. Their cry of "taxation without representation," repeated year after year, seems to have yielded results, in New York State, at least. Recent declarations before and after the November election had indicated a willingness to talk over inequities in allowable deductions and other difficulties faced by nonresidents.

Now that we are approaching a new climate of cooperation, the time for more formal action, as proposed in the new bill, has come.

A constitutional amendment is a fine-sounding proposal for ultimate solution of the nonresident taxation problem. But it is long range and susceptible to all the ills that kill off constitutional amendments. I find it difficult to believe that the 31 States which now tax nonresidents will suddenly decide that they will abolish the taxes. We can keep this plan as a distant goal, but we must also do what we can in 1959 to ease unfair burdens on persons who live in one State and work in another. This problem is not unique to New Jersey. I believe and hope the new proposal will win widespread support.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 991) granting the consent of Congress to the several States to enter into compacts providing for the uniform tax treatment of nonresidents, introduced by Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PROGRAM OF WEATHER MODIFICATION

Mr. BIBLE. Mr. President, I am pleased to be one of the sponsors of the bill (S. 943) to provide for a program of weather modification to be carried out by the Secretary of the Interior, acting in cooperation with the National Science Foundation, to increase substantially the annual average of usable supply of water available in the Colorado River drainage basin, and for other purposes, introduced on yesterday by the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. ENGLE], for himself and other Senators, the results of which may be far reaching to a section of our Nation where increased water supply is a vital necessity.

Weather modification, popularly known as cloud seeding, is relatively new, although its feasibility has been generally recognized by responsible scientists. While a member of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, I had the opportunity of presiding at hearings on weather modification. Testimony during these hearings, for example, indicated that the streamflow of many of the rivers in the Sierra Nevada region in California and in Nevada had been increased some 9 percent as a result of a cloud seeding program on the western slopes of the high Sierras.

I was privileged to be a cosponsor of a bill introduced in the last session which provided for research and evaluation in the field of weather modification. That bill delegated to the National Science Foundation the responsibility for operating the program.

Mr. President, at the outset of the current session of Congress our able majority leader outlined a legislative program which, among other things, called for a program to step up the supply and conservation of water for the West.

The bill which was introduced on yesterday by the distinguished junior Senator from California [Mr. ENGLE] is designed to assist in carrying out that legislative mandate by providing the necessary tools to increase the annual water supply in the great Colorado River drainage basin.

This measure will work no miracles, Mr. President, but it does represent another positive step on the part of those who are constantly working to bring arid wastelands into full productivity for the betterment of people in the Nation's fastest growing section—the Far West.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I want to congratulate the very able senior Senator from Nevada for the very eloquent and able statement he has made, and to assure him of my continued and complete cooperation in all of his endeavors, and of those associated with him, in connection with this problem, which is very important not only to the entire Nation, but specifically to the great western part of our country.

Mr. BIBLE. I certainly appreciate the sentiments of the majority leader. This problem is not completely regional; the problem of weather modification is of nationwide import. I hope we can move forward in this field.

USE OF COMMODITY CREDIT CORPORATION GRAINS FOR SOIL BANK PAYMENTS

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a statement I have prepared on Senate bill 946, which I introduced yesterday, a bill to provide for the use of Commodity Credit Corporation grains for soil bank payments, be printed in the RECORD as a statement in the section of the RECORD devoted to the morning hour.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR CASE OF SOUTH DAKOTA

S. 946, TO USE CCC GRAINS FOR SOIL BANK PAYMENTS

The stumbling block to improvement of the farm problem is the presence of the big carryover of grain in the stocks of the Commodity Credit Corporation.

In dollars, we are told, these stocks amount to over $9 billion. Set aside, stored, or however they are described, they hang over the market. Not only do they mount year by year but also the cost of storing them mounts as well.

The carrying charges this year will cost nearly $1 billion. That is 11 percent of their value.

While these stocks are assets of the Commodity Credit Corporation, yet what has been paid for them is commonly treated as a part of the cost for the so-called farm program. Certainly the carrying charges, the 11 percent annual storage costs, inspection fees and spoilage losses are all a part of the cost of the annual farm program.

Therefore, it seems axiomatic that the first and most necessary step in improvement of the farm picture is to get rid of these overhanging surpluses with their price-depressing effects. They are at the root of the farm problem.

The carryover should be reduced to normal needs with a reasonable reserve. Any plan to work must carry with it protection against mere replacement of existing stocks with a new crop.

On yesterday I introduced a bill (S. 946) which meets these natural tests.

This bill proposes that these stored grain stocks be made available to pay the costs of renting land for the soil bank. Those farmers who take soil-bank payments in the form of stored commodities rather than cash would receive a bonus of at least 10 percent.

That 10 percent bonus would be less than the annual storage, inspection, and spoilage costs. And this bill's provisions would require no additional manpower nor taxes.

A condition of the bonus would be that the grain could not be reoffered for price-support loan. It could be fed or sold on the open market for consumption or export.

Productive land would be taken out of production in an amount equal to that required for normal yield of the commodity received.

Grain offered under the price-support program has reached such proportions that we now have in storage approximately 2 years supply of normal consumption.

The Congress appropriated $375 million to accept land in the conservation reserve program of the soil bank. The program has been so well received that the entire amount has been obligated and land that cannot be accepted would far exceed the $450 million authorized in the Soil Bank Act.

My bill would make it possible for many additional farmers to get into the land retirement program and yet, at the same time, keep an equivalent amount of grain in the channels of trade or use.

Farmers would, in effect, be insured for that crop season against the hazards of drought, insects, and storms. In addition, they would not have the expenses of operating costs, depreciation of machinery, repairs and labor.

These should be attractive.

Taxpayers in general would be spared the cost of financing storage of constantly mounting surpluses and much of the soil bank program.

The grain payment program would have an automatic cutoff when surpluses were reduced to normal levels.

I should like to call your attention to another facet of this unbearable farm surplus situation. This is the cost of exporting portions of our huge surplus.

Last year 100,000 tons of grain were given to foreign countries as an outright gift under title 2 of Public Law 480.

Exports of wheat under the International Wheat Agreement carry a subsidy of 55 cents to 65 cents a bushel.

And it is impossible to determine what discount the Federal Government is taking when grain is sold abroad for foreign currencies under Public Law 480.

The Commodity Credit Corporation incurs a mammoth loss in spoilage and reduced marketability of high-moisture-content grain offered for storage. This is particularly true in grades four and five corn.

Instead of continuing to take these huge losses, why not put our surpluses to work for us?

Why not let our surpluses work to solve our own farm problem, restore the independence of our farmers and correct our domestic markets?

I believe the bill I have offered provides the opportunity to put the farmer back on his feet as his own boss. As surpluses would decline, markets would improve and the need for Government regulation would diminish.

Once surpluses were reduced to normal levels under this program, the Congress could take a realistic look at the farm situation. As things stand now, we are merely shutting our eyes to the real problem—that of surplus disposal.

It is my hope and expectation that, upon reduction of these surpluses to normal levels, the Government would never again find it necessary to become so deeply involved in the farmer's business as it is now.

I would like to point out that this bill, S. 946, also provides for Federal crop insurance payments in the form of grain with a 10-percent bonus rather than in cash.

A farmer who was hailed out, for example, could collect his insurance payment from a Government bin in the grain of his choice. And he would receive a bonus of at least 10 percent to encourage him to do so.

Unlike the soil bank portion of this bill, however, the farmer could reoffer his grain for price-support loan if it was the same type of grain as that lost by hail. In other words, if a farmer loses his corn crop in a hailstorm, he can take his payment in corn with the bonus, then reoffer it for price support.

Since crop insurance payments rarely, if ever, cover the full amount of a farmer's loss, this proposition should gain wide acceptance among farmers. And the Government would not lose anything on the deal, as compared with giving price support to that farmer's full crop.

Perhaps some Members will have reservations about the effect of this surplus grain payment program on livestock prices. I feel that this program could have no adverse effect. In fact, it should help if it affects them at all.

I am tired of hearing the timeworn statement, "Something has to be done about those surpluses," whenever the farm situation is discussed.

Here at last is that something in what I believe is a realistic and workable approach. I hope it will receive the careful scrutiny of all who are concerned with the farmer's plight.

MEMBERS OF BOARD OF VISITORS TO COAST GUARD AND MERCHANT MARINE ACADEMIES

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I wish to announce that, as chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I have appointed the Senator from Alaska [Mr. BARTLETT] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MORTON] as members of the Board of Visitors to the U.S. Coast Guard Academy, which is in the State of the distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD], who is the present occupant of the chair.

I have also appointed to the Board of Visitors to the U.S. Merchant Marine Academy the Senator from California [Mr. ENGLE] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT].

Under the law the chairman of the said committee is an ex officio member of the board.

ADDRESSES, EDITORIALS, ARTICLES, ETC., PRINTED IN THE RECORD

On request, and by unanimous consent, addresses, editorials, articles, etc., were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. YARBOROUGH:

"Report to the People," written and distributed by Representative J. T. RUTHERFORD, of Texas.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DODD in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

SMALL MONTANA CITY DISCOVERS ITSELF

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, in recent years many of our small towns and cities have had to struggle to exist; in fact, many of them are slowly disintegrating. The small communities of this country have provided the backbone for our economy for many years; but today they are finding it difficult to compete with the lure of the big cities. Mechanization in modes of travel and everyday living has made people less dependent on the small towns and cities.

Throughout the country these smaller communities have been making numerous attempts to attract new industries, in the hope that they can establish sound payrolls which would stabilize their economy.

The city of Columbus, Mont., recognized the need for such action; and the local Kiwanis Club, in cooperation with the local people, has worked hard in exploring all possibilities of getting a small industry for Columbus. They have succeeded in obtaining a wooden beam manufacturing industry, which now is in operation. In addition, there are prospects of other new industries for the city.

Columbus, Mont., is to be highly congratulated on its initiative. It has set an example for others to follow.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at the conclusion of my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article entitled "Columbus Discovers Itself," written by Lafayette Smith and published in the December–January issue of the Kiwanis magazine.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COLUMBUS DISCOVERS ITSELF

(Columbus, Mont., had to fight for its life. And its Kiwanis Club started the battle.)

(By Lafayette Smith)

The town of Columbus, Mont., isn't considered large even by Montana standards. Its population barely exceeded 1,000 when the 1950 census was taken, and most of the residents seemed to feel that it had slipped since then. With the trend in agriculture going toward larger farms and fewer farmers, there didn't seem to be as much room for the little farmer any more—and Columbus was mainly a town of little farmers.

As Columbus was a small town, so was its Kiwanis Club, averaging between 20 to 25 members. For its size though, the club was active. It conducted a countrywide 4–H Club fair and livestock sale every year. It also entertained the townspeople with a minstrel show, thus collecting some money, and built a park in the center of town, planting grass and providing benches. "If we didn't have faith in the town's future," claims Club President William B. Witt, "we never would have built that park."

That faith got its first practical expression one noon during the fall of 1956. Gene Davey, who sold and fixed automobiles and was the Kiwanis president too, showed up at the Liberty Cafe, where the club met every Tuesday, with clipping in hand. The clipping noted that the old building down by the railroad tracks was for sale.

The building, measuring 200 feet long and 115 feet wide, had been built during the war by the U.S. Government and was used as a service station for trucks coming out of the Beartooth Mountains 35 miles to the south, laden with chromite ore. After the war the Bureau of Reclamation used it for some time as a warehouse, but now it stood empty.

Following the Kiwanis meeting, 10 members stayed late to talk about the building. "Why don't we buy it, and use it as a lure to bring a new industry to our town?" said Gene Davey. The idea was discussed, accepted, and soon eight Kiwanians were pulling checkbooks out of their pockets, and two others were running home to get theirs. Within a few hours $10,000 had been pledged. Thus was Columbus Enterprises, Inc., formed—by men who were pledged to the preservation of their home town.

Bob Johnson, editor and publisher of the town's only newspaper, the Columbus News, journeyed to Seattle, Wash., to make a bid on the building. Gene Davey soon received a wire: "Purchased building for $26,000. Find us an industry."

Finding an industry, now that they had acquired a site for one, proved to be no easy task. Columbus Enterprises advertised in the Wall Street Journal and Business Week. A variety of answers soon flooded Gene Davey's desk. One man wanted to use the building as a cattle feed lot, but he did not intend to employ anyone. His offer was respectfully declined. A company manufacturing trailers and buses applied. "No prospects for future growth," decided the Kiwanians. Several obliging contractors offered to dismantle the building. They were politely thanked.

Then, as chance might have it, Gene Davey and Bob Johnson heard of two men named Ralph Heiken and Thelmar Mosdal, who during the lax winter season were building barn beams in a small corrugated steel shed in nearby Broadview, only 55 miles from Columbus. They needed more room. Soon they were invited to come to Columbus.

Also invited to come to Columbus was another Montana citizen named Ken Davenport. Ken had graduated from Montana

State College of Engineering in 1950, had spent an inevitable 2 years in the service, then had sold Fords in Big Timber, Mont. Ken, however, wasn't quite certain that he wanted a Ford in his future, so when several of his friends in Columbus told him that a new industry was starting he offered his services. Another Montanan, Russell Wolfe, was hired as a sales expert, and these two, along with Mosdal and Heiken, left for the west coast to observe and report on the beam-manufacturing industry. They were particularly concerned with the prospects of glue lamination in beam construction.

"Today, 60-foot trees are a rarity," they reported on their return. "Within a dozen years or so, 30-foot trees will be just as rare. Yet with modern construction demands, structural beams of over 100 feet are needed, especially in the construction of modern schools, churches, and auditoriums."

With this favorable report, the construction of laminated wooden beams in Columbus began and the organization was officially titled Timberweld, Inc., with Ken Davenport president and sales manager; Wolfe, secretary treasurer; and Heiken and Gene Davey, vice presidents. The 15 members of Columbus Enterprises purchased $50,000 worth of stock, while approximately 75 other Columbus citizens accounted for $50,000 more. Very shortly that stock began to pay dividends, and has been doing so ever since.

Ken Davenport explains his company's success this way: "In Montana, it is very difficult to find types of industry that can be carried on economically for manufacturing and shipment of material to other points in the United States. There are many reasons for this: Freight, the availability of raw materials, and concentration of markets. However, in the case of glu-lam material, we have found that it can be manufactured and shipped to virtually 75 percent of the United States on a very competitive basis with other glu-lam fabricators in other parts of the country. Presently we've shipped glue-laminated material for schools, churches, and industrial buildings to New York, Pennsylvania, Michigan, Minnesota, North and South Dakota, Wyoming, Colorado, and other Midwestern States. Our intended volume for the year of 1958 has been doubled over our sales for 1957." With the country in the midst of a recession, these were encouraging words.

The increase in Timberweld's sales for 1958 was first reflected in the increase in manpower in their plant—later, in the pockets of Columbus citizens. At present, 30 men and women are employed by the company with an annual payroll of more than $100,000. According to estimates made by the State planning board, for every additional four persons brought to a town, it takes one more person (such as a grocer, druggist, dentist, etc.) to service him. Conversely, when a town loses four residents through migration to another area, one of its shopowners might as well close up.

Kiwanis President William B. Witt has commented on this situation: "Already we notice a lot of new faces on the streets. Timberweld's payroll has stabilized the real estate market for one thing. Before, there wasn't enough demand for living quarters, and prices were dropping. Now prices are remaining where they should be."

Shortly after Timberweld received its start in Columbus, Kiwanians and the townspeople in general began passing the word to their friends and business acquaintances that the welcome mat was out to new industry. In July of 1957, Sherman Lang, an engineer for Mouat Industries, a chemical producing firm, appeared in Columbus to have a look at this town he had heard so much about. His company was leased 5 acres of land at tax cost, and within a few months a pilot plant to process chrome had been established under his supervision. Eight men began carrying on daily experiments to determine whether or not to establish a larger factory. Should that occur, it would perhaps mean a payroll of 300 employees.

The fame of Columbus spread even further. The Montana State Planning Board in Helena issued a pamphlet called simply "The Columbus Success Story." It was subtitled "Community Action for Economic Development Pays Dividends." This pamphlet was distributed throughout the United States.

As for the town's future, Bob Johnson is glad to talk about it: "Mouat Industries have been successful in producing their basic product (sodium chromate), and are enthusiastic about their future in this field. While no other industries have moved into Columbus to date, there have been several inquiries. The American Chrome Co. south of Columbus has received a go-ahead on construction of a pilot smelter to test the feasibility of producing ferrochrome on a competitive basis with foreign ores. If successful, and they are reasonably confident that they will be, Columbus may become the railhead for movement of this ore to the steel mills."

At a recent meeting of the city council, three Kiwanians moved that a strip of land 1 mile long by 300 feet wide along the railroad tracks be set aside for potential industries. Their motion was unanimously carried. Columbus, as usual, was looking ahead.

SECRETARY OF INTERIOR SEATON EYES HAWAII'S STAR

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, in the January 23, 1959, issue of the Christian Science Monitor there appeared a capital interview conducted by Courtney Sheldon with Secretary of the Interior Fred A. Seaton. In my opinion, Mr. Seaton is one of the outstanding Cabinet members of the present administration. The interview presents in a forthright manner Secretary Seaton's views in favor of the admission of Hawaii as our 50th State. I go along entirely with what the Secretary of Interior had to say, and I congratulate him for his statement on the long-overdue admission of Hawaii as a State of the Union. I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed at this point in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEATON EYES HAWAII'S STAR

(By Courtney Sheldon)

WASHINGTON.—The Eisenhower administration's politically versatile Secretary of Interior Fred A. Seaton, has Hawaiian statehood at the top of his Department's project list this year. This is the outlook as he sees it:

"On the basis of my latest figures * * * we have a majority of the Senate (the traditional stumbling block) that has indicated its intent to sponsor the (Hawaiian statehood) bill.

"The record that the union (the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's) can tie up the Hawaii economy must be admitted, but there are other unions (in the States) that have successfully demonstrated that they can tie up very important segments of the economy of the United States.

"The question of whether some Hawaiians have oriental blood seems to me to be of absolutely no importance in the situation, except as it affects our relation (presumably favorable) with other nations in the Far East."

The man who heads the Department responsible for governing the Territories of the United States gave this complete and reason-filled rundown on the Hawaii picture in an interview with this correspondent:

"Do you expect, Mr. Secretary, that there will be a 50th star for Hawaii in our flag by this time next year."

"Yes, I do. I think that we have every chance of adding a 50th star in the flag."

"Do you anticipate a close vote in the Senate (the traditional stumbling block) either in committee or on the floor?"

"I do not anticipate a close vote either in the committee or on the floor. I am particularly certain about the floor part of it because of the information I have as to the number of Senators, Republican and Democrat, who have agreed at least informally to go together and jointly introduce the bill for Hawaiian statehood. On the basis of my latest figures and there will be more additions to them, I am sure, we have a majority of the Senate that has indicated its intent to sponsor the bill."

"What do you feel is the strongest argument for the admission of Hawaii now?"

"I think you can sum that up in one phrase. It is that simple justice demands it. It would be unconscionable to me to have the Congress of the United States deny statehood for Hawaii, particularly after the Congress in the past session granted statehood for Alaska.

"Now the Hawaiians have long since demonstrated their ability to carry on their own affairs in an orderly fashion. Hawaii is on a sound, stable, financial basis. The population is greater than six of the present States of the Union—Alaska, Nevada, Wyoming, Vermont, Delaware, and New Hampshire, And the Internal Revenue collections of Hawaii total more than the Internal Revenue collections in 10 of the present States of the Union—New Hampshire, Vermont, North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, Idaho, Wyoming, New Mexico, Nevada, and Alaska.

"Furthermore, it has been understood down through the years, even from the time when we took over the Hawaiian Islands, that eventually they would be granted statehood. And as long as 8 years ago, the Hawaiians adopted what would be their State constitution if they had the privilege of statehood.

"The Hawaiians have all the obligations of statehood. They have all the military service obligations that the residents of the 49 States have. They pay all the Federal taxes that the residents of the 49 States pay. The one thing they don't have is the right of suffrage. And I repeat it would just be unconscionable for me if the Congress were to deny the Hawaiians full-fledged American citizenship."

"How much stock do you place in the long-standing charge of opponents of Hawaiian statehood that the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union, which has thoroughly organized dock and plantation workers in Hawaii and has been charged with having Communist leadership, is in a position to tie up the Hawaiian economy and dictate political decisions?"

"I think the record that the union can tie up the Hawaiian economy must be admitted. It has done that in rather recent years. Now there are other unions that have successfully demonstrated that they can tie up very important segments of the economy of the United States if they so choose. And one union in particular threatened to organize all the policemen recently. So I don't think that that is a valid argument against statehood. It might be a regrettable fact, depending upon your point of view. But it certainly does not vitiate the cause of statehood.

"Now so far as any union in Hawaii being able to dictate the political personalities to be elected in the case of statehood, or to dictate what those personalities might do were they elected, I think the record is quite clear that no union has been successful in doing that in Hawaii. Some of the candidates endorsed by the union to which you refer were victorious in the last elections in Hawaii, but by and large the union was not successful in electing candidates which it publicly had endorsed."

"Well, do you feel that if Hawaii becomes a State it will be in any better position to stave off such a Communist threat?"

"I don't see how you can make the argument that statehood could make it more difficult for Hawaiians to control their affairs. That certainly is a specious argument."

"Do you anticipate as much support as ever from Republicans for Hawaiian statehood now that the trend in the last three elections in Hawaii has been more toward the Democrats?"

"Oh, yes; I certainly do. This is a moral question rather than a political question. I said repeatedly while we were fighting for Alaska and Hawaiian statehood in the last session of the Congress that I couldn't find anything in the Constitution of the United States that gave preference to one political party over the other."

"Southern Democrats have frequently argued for a Commonwealth status for Hawaii instead of statehood. It is presumed that they are afraid that Hawaiians will join forces trying to break filibusters on civil rights. How do you look at this?"

"Well, the latter is an assumption that some people have made. There are some people in the Congress, not alone southerners, who argued for a Commonwealth status for Alaska. Now those same people, I think, will argue for a Commonwealth status for Hawaii. I think that is entirely beside the point. I don't question their sincerity.

"In the first place, the Commonwealth in the system of American Government is neither fish nor fowl nor good red meat. And I am sure the Hawaiians would never be satisfied with any such proposed solution; it still deprives Hawaiians of their right of suffrage, certainly so far as national representation is concerned. The only parallel you have to it is the case of Puerto Rico, and in the case of Puerto Rico the Puerto Ricans themselves asked for Commonwealth status."

"It has been estimated that some 82 percent of the Hawaiian population is native-born, but about 70 percent of it is of Asian ancestry (Japanese, Chinese, Korean, and Filipino). This makes it likely that in time United States Senators and Representatives will be drawn from this group. Would there be any significant consequences from such an event in your opinion?"

"Well, in the first place these Hawaiians have demonstrated their loyalty. There wasn't a single case even of suspected espionage both before and after Pearl Harbor clear through the conclusion of the war.

"Now the question of whether some Hawaiians have oriental blood seems to me to be of absolutely no importance in the situation except as it affects our relations with other nations in the Far East. It might be that eventually a Senator would be elected who would be of mixed blood, say of Chinese, Japanese, Korean and American—whatever American blood is—and I think that would be all to the good so long as the individual properly represented the best interests of the people of Hawaii. And I certainly think he would."

"Finally, Mr. Secretary, now that the concept of the United States as a fixed land mass with relatively stable frontiers has been once more shattered by Alaska and likely will be by Hawaii, do you feel that the United States has expanded territorially as much as it will?"

"Yes, I think so, certainly in the foreseeable future. I myself know of no other Territories of the United States which are petitioning for admission to statehood. I would suspect it would be a long, long time in the future before the question of statehood for any other land mass which is presently associated with the United States, either as a Territory, or possession, would ever be raised."

THE COST TO CITIZENS PERSONALLY OF THE MAJOR FUNCTIONS OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a table and an explanation for the use of it, which will allow everyone to figure just what amount he is paying to support the major functions of his Federal Government.

This is the period of the year when all of us are struggling so hard to perform the annual chore of computing our income tax for the Federal Government. At this particular time it would seem to me a matter of great interest to taxpayers to realize just what dollars-and-cents figure out of their return goes to the support of these functions.

The table which I am submitting is simple to use, and will give the exact figure attributable to each item. Aside from this matter of interest, there is also in the table information as to what the major functions of Government comprise, and the percentage of each hundred dollars of revenue allotted to the function.

There being no objection, the table and explanation were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In order that you may know how your income tax dollars are being spent, an outline of the U.S. budget for the fiscal year 1960 is shown here.

Column A shows the cost of each major item of the Federal budget.

Column B shows what part of each $100 of your tax is used for each of these major groups of budget items.

If you will multiply the figure in column B by the amount of your tax in hundreds of dollars (for example, if your tax is $525, multiply by 5.25) you will find how much you will pay in 1959 to maintain each activity listed.

The U.S. budget for fiscal 1960

NOTICE OF ADDRESS BY SENATOR ELLENDER ON HIS VISIT TO SOUTH AND CENTRAL AMERICA

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I wish to give notice to the Senate that on next Monday, February 9, immediately after the transaction of the routine morning business, I shall make a report on my recent visit to the countries of South and Central America. I hope that as many Senators as can do so will be present at that time.

SECOND CONFERENCE OF GOVERNORS ON CIVIL RIGHTS

Mr. HART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the opening address by Gov. G. Mennen Williams, of Michigan, at the second conference of Governors on civil rights, at Detroit, Mich., on January 31, 1959, together with the statement adopted at the conference.

This conference, the second of its nature, represented 18 States. The Governor of Minnesota, Hon. Orville L. Freeman, was named the new chairman of the conference, the new vice chairman being the Governor of Illinois, Hon. William G. Stratton.

There being no objection, the address and statement were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OPENING ADDRESS BY GOV. G. MENNEN WILLIAMS AT THE SECOND CONFERENCE OF GOVERNORS ON CIVIL RIGHTS, DETROIT, MICH., JANUARY 31, 1959

On behalf of the people of Michigan and the Governors' committee on civil rights, I welcome you to Michigan and to the second conference of Governors on civil rights.

If you will permit me, I would like to take a few moments, as we open this conference, to review something of the history of these Governors' meetings and to comment on the scope of our deliberations in the sessions today.

A little over a year ago, Gov. Averell Harriman and I invited the Governors of the 12 States with enforcible fair employment practices laws and operating State commissions to meet together for the purpose of reviewing our individual State experience. We also wanted to assess the progress that had been made in these States and to see if we could not strengthen interstate cooperation in the civil rights field.

We met in New York City on the occasion of the 10th anniversary of the report of President Truman's Committee on Civil Rights—a report that was to have a great and lasting impact on our national life.

Twelve States were present at that historic meeting. The joint statement that issued from that meeting has been widely circulated. But more important, we determined to establish an informal continuing committee of Governors. Gov. Robert Holmes, then Governor of Oregon, served with me during this past year as secretary—and let me now pay him my deepest respects for his counsel and assistance. We also established an interim subcommittee, at the staff or commission level, which has been chaired during this past year by John Field, executive director of our Michigan Fair Employment Practices Commission. This whole subcommittee has worked with dedication and devotion and has done an outstanding job. They have met four times—in Colorado, New York, Michigan, and Pennsylvania—and have kept abreast of the problems, progress, and new ideas engendered in each State. By this continuing process we have supported and strengthened each other in promoting full civil rights for our citizens.

During the past year a great deal of unheralded and unpublicized work has been undertaken to advance the status of civil rights in our States and in the Nation. Let me list a few of these activities for you.

A second report has been prepared by the continuing committee and is available here. It deals with our collective experience with State antidiscrimination regulation in the fields of housing, education, and public accommodations. This is a companion report of last year's report on employment. It will have great value in the State legislative sessions now under way—with many of the Governors present asking for new and broader legislation.

In addition, several drafts and working papers have been prepared and discussed in the area of uniform or model legislation. And while no recommendations have yet been formulated, much valuable experience has been drawn together and is available for other States to study.

We have made available specific consultative assistance on legislation to two States that are considering FEPC laws this year.

Related to this, the committee recognized that a growing number of States were developing an interest in broader State civil rights laws—based upon the tested procedures of conciliation and adjustment used by our commissions with enforcement powers. There was need to bring into our discussions the experience of those States having other types of laws and advisory commissions. We, therefore, decided to broaden the invitation to this second conference to include all those States having any form of publicly financed civil rights or human relations programs. We are happy that these States have responded so cordially to our invitation.

Again, at the working level, a series of proposals designed to strengthen interstate cooperation and action on such vital problems as research, complaint action involving interstate commerce, nonregulatory activities, and migrant labor and population movement are currently being circulated and discussed.

Finally, during the past year, the committee has enlarged its interest to include the vital area of Federal-State relations. At last year's conference, suggestions for action were made to the President's Committee on Government Contracts and our Governors' committee offered its full cooperation. Then, as now, we are concerned about discrimination in interstate transportation, particularly in the employment of pilots and stewardesses by the Nation's leading airlines. As you know the laws of our separate States may not be adequate to handle this, nor is there direct Federal legislation in this area. The fact that two or three carriers have made gestures in the right direction, has not diminished our concern. We look forward with great interest to the meeting now scheduled for February 18 in Washington between representatives of the President's Committee and representatives of most of our State commissions.

In addition, during the past year, at least two informal conferences have been held with the executive director and executive secretary of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights. These meetings were suggested by the Governors' Committee for the purpose of providing what assistance we could and of appraising progress. While we are encouraged by recent Commission actions in connection with voting rights—and while we will continue to provide the Commission with every possible assistance and cooperation, perhaps it might be pointed out this Commission and the civil rights section of the Attorney General's Office have available to them more funds than all of our States combined. Of necessity, it is in this context that their efforts will be measured by many.

We are fortunate that Dr. John Hannah will be meeting with us at our luncheon session today to report further on their progress.

As we conclude this first year and as we begin this second Governors' conference on civil rights, we have laid out an agenda before us that will embrace both States' responsibilities and the urgent question of Federal-State relationships as they affect and contribute to a national policy on civil rights.

This is not a problem of North or South. As we look at the question of desegregation in our public schools, we all have, I am sure, sympathy and understanding for problems growing out of changing times and economic dislocations. Racial crisis and discrimination are not new to Michigan—or any of our States—nor are we sufficiently free from them now.

What our States have tried to do—individually and jointly—is build a body of law and commonsense methods that will help us solve some of these problems.

We want to share this experience with each other and other States. It is clear from our experience that where fair employment practices laws and conciliation procedures have been tried they have worked and they have been supported by our citizens. These procedures are now being applied to other aspects of civil rights as well.

Ours has not been a partisan approach. Democrats and Republicans joined together in our States to build this great body of law, procedure, and public opinion. We should continue to think, act, and lead together if we are to make the best further progress.

Naturally, most of our discussion will revolve around our State programs and procedures. These I have pretty well run over already—they involve discrimination in jobs, housing, public accommodations, and education. In the area of national legislation, however, we may well wish to discuss and consider the benefit of certain civil rights proposals that have already been made.

First, the proposal which I understand has already been supported by 15 Senators of both parties to restore part III of the 1957 Federal Civil Rights Act. That is the part, you will recall, which gives the Federal Government broader powers in initiating court action.

Second, the various proposals for conciliation machinery with or without enforcement powers. Senator JOHNSON has suggested a national community relations service but has not included enforcement. As you know, the Governors' committee last year recommended a Federal FEPC. Perhaps we will want to discuss giving enforcement powers to a new Federal Commission in both voting and employment which could be established when the present Commission expires in September.

Third, we may wish to discuss Federal assistance to States and local communities who have formulated plans for desegregating their public schools, along the lines of the Douglas bill. The Douglas bill would provide funds for additional teachers, retraining programs, consultation services and, where needed, additional classrooms and facilities. Everything possible must be done to overcome the backlog of neglect and make it possible for local communities to face this problem without apprehension, knowing they will get help.

Finally, we may wish to consider Senator KENNEDY'S antibombing legislation and other measures which have been proposed to curb violence and intimidation.

My own recommendations are both simple and undramatic. As I see it, we need both State and national, bipartisan race relations policies which will utilize all the resources of conciliation and education in support of law.

Let me repeat that—we must urgently bring to bear all the resources of conciliation and education in support of law.

We have had momentous and inspiring court decisions protecting and guaranteeing human rights. We have seen the development of a solid and growing body of civil rights law at the State level. There are now 25 States with some form of antidiscrimination law, embracing two-thirds of our population. We have even seen a beginning made at the Federal level and we have every expectation that more legislative progress will be made this year.

But beyond this: We need a synthesizing national policy. Law is necessary. But it is not enough. We must build confidence in and a commitment to the ideals and morality that our law expresses. Let us restore to America the vitality of human dignity and the dynamism of mutual respect. This will unloose the confined and hidden resources that can build a richer and better life in America. This will open the gates to human understanding and brotherhood all around the world. It will bring nearer the day of a just and lasting peace.

This, ladies and gentlemen, is the challenge to which this conference can respond with real leadership.

STATEMENT ADOPTED AT SECOND CONFERENCE OF GOVERNORS ON CIVIL RIGHTS HELD AT DETROIT, MICH., JANUARY 31, 1959

The second conference of Governors on civil rights emphasizes the fact that more than two-thirds of this Nation's population now have the protection of statutory civil-rights safeguards through their State governments. The manifestations of discrimination which mar the unity of our Nation in its effort to assure equal rights to all are regrettable but fortunately are not general in our society.

Our conference finds that special programs to fight this inequity are now in effect in 25 States, and is encouraged to observe that progress is being made in other States.

California, Illinois, and Ohio, all huge, industrial States newly represented at this conference, are now supporting new FEPC legislation. Six additional States—Connecticut, Michigan, Minnesota, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, and Washington are considering new or strengthened legislation to curb discrimination in housing.

We are encouraged by this positive and affirmative experience reported by the 18 States represented at this conference. We affirm our acceptance of public responsibility to protect the civil rights of our citizens in matters of employment, public accommodation, housing, and education regardless of race, religion, or ancestry.

To do this we believe, first, that our States, individually and jointly, need to strengthen the body of law and procedure that has enabled them to make such progress as they have. The processes of conciliation and education, when backed by enforcement powers, have broken the bonds of fear and ignorance. They are a light for the whole Nation to follow. We support this proven principle of conciliation and education procedures, backed by reasonable civil enforcement, and look forward to their extension.

The conference considers the problem of civil rights a mutual problem of the States and Federal Government. Progress on this front, it is recognized, rests ultimately on understanding, tolerance, and democratic acceptance. Our experience demonstrates that a framework of law is necessary to bring about this understanding.

If we are to live up to the American ideal of equal opportunity, we must work at both State and Federal levels to build this workable framework.

At the Federal level, we call upon the executive branch and the Congress to match the commitment of these States. We call upon the Chief Executive to use his prestige and power to give guidance and leadership that will help create a positive climate of public opinion. We call upon the Congress to enact and extend vitally needed Federal legislation. We are heartened by the vigor and leadership of our courts in redefining and reasserting our moral concern with the issues of human rights. But we can no longer leave to the courts alone the responsibility for effecting and achieving the civil and human rights of all our people. We call for strict Executive enforcement of existing laws and Executive orders. We pledge compliance ourselves and call upon all States to do likewise.

We specifically call upon Congress to authorize broader Federal action with regard to voting rights, to facilitate the orderly desegregation of schools, to curb violence and intimidation and to enact Federal fair employment practices legislation. Finally, we endorse the creation of an effective Federal service on community relations problems.

Finally, we pledge and call upon all America to reemphasize our heritage of morality and brotherhood to the end that all men may live in dignity, peace, and security.

OPPOSITION TO TRANSFER OF TELEVISION CHANNEL 12 FROM DELAWARE

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a statement prepared by me in opposition to the proposal that TV channel 12 be transferred from the State of Delaware. This statement is also being called to the attention of both the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and the Federal Communications Commission.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR WILLIAMS OF DELAWARE

In recent weeks there has been a noticeable increase in the intensity of the campaign which has as its objective the transfer of the assignment of television channel 12 from commercial use in Wilmington, Del., to educational, noncommercial use in Philadelphia, Pa.

This effort to move the assignment of this television channel to Philadelphia from Wilmington is not new. It has a history which dates back to February 1955, and includes some rather unfortunate examples of misplaced trust, a warped interpretation of written pledges made to the Federal Communications Commission, and an outright disregard of the rights and desires of the people of Delaware by both the Commission and prior operators.

Now there is a new effort being made by people outside the State of Delaware to have this allocation transferred. This new effort, pleasantly, has the virtue of being honest and open. It is not cloaked in subterfuge; it does not purport to be something it is not; its purpose is clearly stated. And that is a refreshing change.

By way of brief background, let me say that the State of Delaware does not now have any local television service. There is no television station operating within the limits of our State. However, back in April 1952, when the FCC withdrew its celebrated freeze on the construction of new television stations and announced its national overall allocations plans for both ultrahigh frequency assignments and very high frequency assignments, as well as its plan for the assignment of commercial and educational uses of those channels, Delaware was given one VHF channel, assigned to Wilmington. There were also three UHF channels assigned to the State; two in Wilmington, channels 59 and 83 (the former for noncommercial, educational use only), and one in Dover, channel 40, for commercial use. The VHF channel assigned to Wilmington was and remains channel 12.

Until September of last year, channel 12 had been in use by commercial operators, but by that time the amount and quality of service directed toward the State of Delaware had diminished almost to the vanishing point. The station had moved its transmitter over to New Jersey, in order to better serve Philadelphia (which purpose was vigorously denied at the time) and its main and only studios (the FCC continued to attempt to perpetrate the illusion that they were only auxiliary studios) were located in the heart of downtown Philadelphia. Yet, in the blinded eyes of the FCC, this was still a Delaware station, operating in and for the public interest of the people of Wilmington and Delaware even though there was not so much as a camera, a microphone, or a vacuum tube owned by the station physically located in Delaware.

The manner in which the FCC has consistently sat by while Delaware's only VHF television facility was being moved, piece by piece, to Philadelphia, is positively fascinating. Each time another move was announced by the station or discovered by interested parties, protests to the FCC were dispatched from my office and the offices of other members of the Delaware congressional delegation. But each time, the Commission would don its blinders, dutifully listen to the protests, then decide that another move would be in the public interest, convenience, and necessity of the area to be served which all along we were led to believe meant Delaware.

As an example of the manner in which the citizens of Delaware have had their needs and desires ignored both by the operators of the former station and by the Commission in its decisions affecting this station, I quote this incredible story:

When WDEL–TV, which was then operating on channel 12, was sold to Paul F. Harron early in 1955, there were many protests lodged with the FCC. It was feared then that Mr. Harron was purchasing the station only so that he could move it to Philadelphia and transform it into a Philadelphia station. In order to remove or lessen these fears, the Commission made a stipulation to the sale to Mr. Harron in these words:

"This grant has been made with the explicit understanding of the Commission that the verified expression of your intentions concerning your operation of WDEL–TV and your recognition of the station's responsibility to the city of Wilmington contained in your amended letter dated February 24 (1955) fully encompasses an intention to not only maintain the station at its present location both with respect to transmitter site and main studio facilities but also with respect to all other facets of operations and service, including programing consonate with, if not subservient to, the public interests of the principal city to be served; namely, Wilmington; with secondary consideration in this respect being given to the local interests of any other segment of the station's coverage area."

That seems to me to be an extremely clear and explicit statement of intention on the part of the Commission and leaves absolutely no room for doubt in the minds of anyone, regardless of how they may wish to add a new interpretation to it. I doubt that a statement of intention and understanding could be written any more clearly.

Yet approximately 2 years later, when Mr. Harron finally did what everybody expected him to do in the first place—namely, apply for permission to move the transmitter out of Delaware—the Commission adopted an attitude that I felt at the time was truly incredible. I am still unable to reconcile it with its action as stated above.

Naturally, they granted the request of Mr. Harron to move the transmitter. And when called upon to explain how such an action is in accord with their previous stipulation as outlined above, Mr. George C. McConnaughey, then chairman of the Federal Communications Commission, came forth with this priceless example of absurd inconsistency: "I would like to point out that the Commission was fully aware of these representations. After careful consideration of all of the factors involved the Commission reached the conclusion that a grant would serve the public interest, convenience and necessity. In reaching this conclusion, we were convinced that on the basis of the showing made by WPFH (formerly WDEL-TV) the interests of Wilmington would not be adversely affected by the proposed move."

So there we have a written statement by the Commission to Mr. Harron in 1955, which the people of Delaware somewhat reluctantly accepted at face value, being torn to shreds and thrown back in their faces.

By this time, Mr. Harron had succeeded in opening new studios in Philadelphia, while all the time proclaiming that they were only "auxiliary" studios. First most, later all, of the live programing was transferred from Wilmington. Under a later owner, the Storer Broadcasting Co., the Wilmington studios were closed down and only a skeleton office staff was left to serve the "public interest, convenience, and necessity" of Delawareans. Each Saturday, live programing would originate in Wilmington from a rented hotel room with remote equipment. Yet we were still being exhorted to understand that we still had a bona fide Wilmington television station.

In September 1958, to the regret of no one in Delaware, the television station (since renamed WVUE) ceased operations. On December 22, 1958, Storer's authorization for use of the channel was deleted by the Federal Communications Commission. Delaware was, at last, officially, even in the eyes of the Commission, now without local television service.

When it became known that Storer was about to throw in the sponge on its channel 12 operations, the scramble began to acquire the facility for other uses. On September 12, 1958, the Joint Council on Educational Television petitioned the FCC to amend the Commission's rules so as to reserve channel 12 at Wilmington for noncommercial educational use rather than for commercial use. Shortly thereafter, a local Delaware broadcaster applied to the Commission for permission to operate the facility commercially, and early this year, on January 6, 1959, still another petition was filed with the FCC for the use of the channel. The latter one came from the Neptune Broadcasting Corp., which wants to shift channel 12 all the way to Atlantic City, N.J. All three petitions are now being considered by the FCC.

But as I said earlier, the campaign to have this channel transformed into a noncommercial educational station centered in Philadelphia is now in full swing. Educational interests in Philadelphia and southern New Jersey have decided that Wilmington's commercial channel could be put to better advantage by having the Commission declare it reserved for educational purposes, despite its original allocation of this channel for commercial uses. It is proposed that this educational television venture be made and sponsored jointly by Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware.

A few days ago the Senators from Pennsylvania and the senior Senator from New Jersey sponsored a bill that intends to insure that channel 12 will be redesignated for noncommercial educational uses only. The Joint Council on Educational Television, from its headquarters at 1785 Massachusetts Avenue NW., Washington 6, D.C., is in the forefront of this effort, yet its petition to the FCC was presented, I understand, prior to any contact, authorization, or agreement with educational interests in Delaware. The Educational Television Council, 1919 Packard Building, Philadelphia 2, Pa., is also plugging hard for this reassignment.

It seems, then, that quite a few people outside of Delaware are greatly interested in obtaining that which has been allocated to Delaware and that which should remain in Delaware. Our endorsement of this move has been solicited, to be sure, and it has been suggested that the educational nature of the station would be such that Delaware interests would be served. I hope we can be forgiven if we look at this proposal of protection of Delaware interests with just a little skepticism, however, in light of past experience.

Just last week, Gov. David L. Lawrence, of Pennsylvania, was in contact with Gov. J. Caleb Boggs, of Delaware, concerning the use of channel 12 for educational purposes in the tristate area. Governor Boggs replied to Governor Lawrence on January 30, 1959, and provided me with a copy of his reply. I have the permission of Governor Boggs to quote his letter here, and ask unanimous consent that it be included as a portion of my remarks at this point.

In the past several days I have received numerous communications from various chambers of commerce and individual citizens in Delaware protesting any such reassignment of this channel. Each one of these telegrams and letters and petitions will be forwarded to the Commission in order that they may know firsthand the views held by Delaware citizens.

My own position on this matter is quite clear. I am unalterably opposed to the transfer of this facility outside the State of Delaware for the primary use of non-Delaware interests. We have only one VHF television station assigned to our State. Every State has at least one. It should not seem the least bit unreasonable for us to want to keep that one channel. I have absolutely no interest in who finally operates a television station on this channel, just so long as it is operated in Delaware with programs that will have an appeal to and an interest for Delawareans.

I have recently filed a vigorous protest with Mr. John C. Doerfer, Chairman of the Federal Communications Commission, against the reassignment of channel 12 outside the State of Delaware. The people of Delaware have been given the runaround on this matter long enough. They have received phony promises of good local service; they have received assurance after assurance from the FCC that their interests are being cared for, when in reality they have been blatantly ignored; they are now being led to believe that outside operations would really be in their best interest. They can be forgiven for not placing too much faith in new promises.

Pennsylvania now has about 10 VHF channels allocated to it. Delaware has but one. If Pennsylvania, in concert with New Jersey, Delaware, or anyone else, wishes to make use of one of their channels for educational purposes, I would surely have no objection. But I do strongly object to any suggestion that they be given our one channel for any purpose.

I have emphasized to the Commission that I would not interfere with their decision as to who should get this channel within Delaware. That is their responsibility. But I do insist that the channel be reserved and assigned only to some applicant who specifically agrees to establish its facilities within our State. Had the Commission adhered to this policy in the past instead of toying with the idea of inching the facilities toward a larger metropolitan area, I am confident we would still have television service in Delaware.

JANUARY 30, 1959.

Hon. DAVID L. LAWRENCE,
Governor of Pennsylvania,
Harrisburg, Pa.

MY DEAR GOVERNOR LAWRENCE: It was a great pleasure to receive your telephone call in regard to Wilmington, Del., TV channel 12, and its possible use as an educational TV facility rather than for commercial purposes.

Some of our educators and other citizens in Delaware are proponents of this thought. I have met with leaders of business, labor, and educators, along with representatives of the proponents' committee. After a rather full discussion and consideration of the tri-state proposal we have reached the conclusion at this time not to participate.

There were many reasons entering into this decision, but more important among those reasons are the following: First, under the plan Delaware would not receive statewide coverage from this channel, and it would not be right to enter into an educational program that would not provide equally for the citizens throughout the State. Second, the State of Delaware is trying hard to meet essential foundation educational requirements both for public school, higher education, and adult education, as well as education for exceptional children, and it is believed that we must strengthen this foundation effort more fully before we undertake an educational project of an enlarging nature. Third, the financial condition of our State at this time is such as to cause us to use unusual caution in taking any steps, directly or indirectly, that might lead to further expense and even weaken the essential services which we are endeavoring to carry on at the present time. Fourth, it was also pointed out that if channel 12 goes into commercial operation there is requirement for so much public service which must be provided and that the commercial operator would welcome educational programs on this public service time and, even further, for nominal costs provide other time upon request as may be worked out by the appropriate educational authority with the commercial operator. Fifth, channel 12 is the only TV station in Delaware. Public opinion, by and large, in this State wishes to retain it as a Delaware channel, with the hope that a commercial operator may not only operate it successfully commercially but that it would beam its public service activities to the Delaware social, cultural, educational, political, and community interests of the people of this State. In other words, there is a large public opinion which believes that this station should service Delaware activities and interests, as well as the commercial aspect.

I greatly appreciate your interest and can readily understand and fully sympathize with the interest of Mayor Dilworth and the Philadelphia community. However, at this time, based upon the discussions and considerations which I have given to the proposal, I must advise you officially, on behalf of the State of Delaware, that we will not participate in the tristate proposal.

Thank you again, and with best wishes and highest personal regards,

Sincerely yours,

J. CALEB BOGGS,
Governor.

TRIBUTE TO MR. AND MRS. ANTHONY BASILICATO FOR THEIR AID TO NEW HAVEN AREA BOY SCOUT GROUPS FOR HANDICAPPED BOYS

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, on February 8 we will celebrate the 49th anniversary of the Boy Scout movement in the United States. I believe that it would be appropriate to cite an individual case which represents a unique and significant type of Boy Scout activity. Despite the different approach, it is in full accord with the objectives and ideals of this great organization.

All too often, only those who participate in humanitarianism on a grandiose scale are given recognition for their contribution to mankind. My intention is to give an example of how great dedication, great generosity, and great love for one's fellow man, manifested on a relatively small scale, can contain within it a most important potential in terms of its inspiration to others.

In 1954, through the efforts of two dedicated people in North Haven, Conn., a Boy Scout unit was started for handicapped boys. Through the efforts of Mr. and Mrs. Anthony Basilicato, boys with all types of physical disability were given an opportunity to share in the activities of the Boy Scout movement. In the group were mentally retarded, crippled, and blind youngsters. Under the direction of Mr. and Mrs. Basilicato, these boys gained the satisfaction of productive activity which boys of sounder bodies obtain quite naturally.

The succcess of the initial group was so inspiring that more and more handicapped youngsters sought similar activity. Mr. and Mrs. Basilicato found the community in complete sympathy with the objectives of their program. In large measure, credit for public recognition of their work can be attributed to the keen interest of Mr. Charles T. McQueeney, managing editor of the New Haven Register, and Mr. John Day, Jackson, publisher of the same paper. Through the full cooperation of these gentlemen, the activities of the Scout units for handicapped boys received generous coverage, both from a news standpoint and editorially, thereby serving to inspire the entire community of Greater New Haven.

From a humble beginning in 1954, there are now five such Boy Scout units in the New Haven area, namely, Pack, Troop, Post, Ship, and Squadron No. 3. All of these have been chartered by the Quinnipiac Council of the Boy Scouts of America. These units have been sustained in their activity primarily through the energy and devotion of Mr. and Mrs. Basilicato.

The objective of better rehabilitation for disabled youngsters has, indeed, taken a giant step forward through the efforts of Mr. and Mrs. Anthony Basilicato.

I ask unanimous consent that an editorial describing this humanitarian work, as published in the New Haven Register of July 31, 1957, be printed in the RECORD following these remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OUR SALUTE FOR JULY: TO THE BASILICATOS

Giving normal satisfactions to young people who face abnormal problems is one of the most difficult of undertakings. And that is what makes the work of Anthony Basilicato and his wife, Mary, of North Haven, so impressive. Together they have launched—and sustained primarily through their own energy and devotion—Boy Scout Post, Pack, Troop, and Ship 3, which is the New Haven area's only organization for handicapped Boy Scouts.

The measure of their problem is the fact that they are in no sense professionals. They are not trained people in terms of medicine, of psychology, or of sociology. And the young people with whom they work represent the full gamut of youthful handicaps—from deafness and bad vision to crippling disease or disfiguring injury.

The measure of their purpose is to be found in the fact that they and their grown children have made almost a family project out of this Boy Scout activity—though their dedication has also attracted a widening source of outside support for the unit, particularly from the New Haven area motion picture industry and related groups.

The measure of their accomplishment lies in the fact that scores of handicapped New Haven youngsters are now annually working their way upward through the Boy Scout achievement ranks, passing the tests that every Scout must pass, mastering through special effort—and with special encouragement—the skills that every Scout must master, besting their handicaps to meet official requirements that they might never have dared to face on their own, finding companionship and understanding and new confidence in the organization that they share.

At Camp Grasso in North Haven, on land which he owns, Anthony Basilicato has provided a special woodland tract where the handicapped Scouts may camp outdoors and meet new challenges from nature. In the winter he and his wife, and their friends and helpers, organize car pools and make special arrangements to keep attendance going among youngsters who often require unusual attention in getting to a meeting. At the moment Boy Scout Post, Pack, Troop, and Ship 3 has a field headquarters set up in front of the New Haven post office, where its members ignore their own problems as they work to gather funds for the underprivileged children who benefit through the Register fresh air fund.

The work of this special Boy Scout troop is, in itself, an inspiring record for all New Haven. The contribution of Anthony and Mary Basilicato to this work is beyond reckoning, because their guidance, their faith, and their energy are all given selflessly. We can salute them with pride as a community—and with humility as individuals.

POTATOES VERSUS RICE

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. Mr. President, being a native of Maine, I have always been an outspoken advocate of the potato. It is the greatest vegetable nature ever gave to mankind. Rarely do I have an evening meal without a good baked potato.

Perhaps because the potato is such a superior vegetable and sits at the top as king of the vegetables, it has become the target of other vegetables that seek to take its place at the top. So other vegetables try to knock the potato down.

Sometimes other vegetables in their desperation to attack the potato disregard the truth. Yet, there are two very applicable old sayings—first, that the truth will out eventually, and second, every knock is a boost. There is another saying not quite so old but just as appropriate—that imitation is the highest form of flattery.

These are some thoughts I would convey to Members of this august body in asking them to read carefully the letter of Mr. Alan T. Rains, executive vice president of the United Fresh Fruit and Vegetable Association, to the Federal Trade Association. It is a masterpiece on the real truth about the potato and another food that seeks to knock off the potato. There is nothing so interesting as the truth. It can be far more fascinating than fiction. My colleagues will certainly find that to be the case when they read Mr. Rains' letter, which I now ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED FRESH FRUIT
& VEGETABLE ASSOCIATION,

Re advertising for Uncle Ben's Quick Rice.

Mr. CHARLES J. CONNOLLY,
Project Attorney, Bureau of Investigation, Federal Trade Commission, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CONNOLLY: In connection with our protests against the offensive advertising, derogatory of potatoes, done on behalf of Uncle Ben's Quick Rice, it was agreed by our representative at the conference with you and other FTC officials on January 19 that we would submit a technical statement on the key points involved in this advertising.

This statement, in which we declare we are quoting correctly and in proper context all authorities to whom we refer, is as follows:

1. The offending statements, as recorded by FTC from television commercials of the advertiser are: "Satisfy your family hunger for potato, yet slash calories off your meals with Uncle Ben's—the golden rice discovery that satisfies potato hunger yet is up to 20 percent less fattening than even baked potato. As a dietitian * * * I recommend Uncle Ben's rice instead of even this baked potato for all my many reducing diets. It has 110 calories. But the same size serving of Uncle Ben's has only 88 actually 20 percent less calories. Uncle Ben's is 20 percent less fattening, yet satisfies like baked potato. It's golden rice so you know it's less fattening, more healthful with twice the natural B vitamins of ordinary rice. And it's foolproof to cook. Turns out white and fluffy every time, even if you've never cooked rice before. * * * So satisfy your family's hunger for potato yet slash calories off your meals with Uncle Ben's golden rice. Satisfies potato hunger yet is 20 percent less fattening."

2. In the commercial, a hand appears, X-ing out the picture of a potato, thereby indicating it is of no importance, and leaving the rice.

3. We expect to prove (a) that in fact, weight for weight, potatoes boiled or baked contain fewer calories than cooked rice, whether Uncle Ben's or any other kind; (b) that in fact rice is not generally recommended for a reducing diet but the contrary is the case; (c) that rice is not a complete substitute for potatoes in the diet because potatoes contain nutrients, including ascorbic acid, not found in rice; (d) that potatoes have value as an alkaline food; (e) that potatoes have value as a supplier of bulk for good digestion, something not true of a highly processed cereal; and (f) that potatoes are nutritionally of great importance to the U.S. population.

4. It should be understood at the outset that we do not discount the nutritive value of rice, including converted rice. Neither do we take any position that people should not eat rice but instead should eat something else. Our statements are directed to the advertising which attacks potatoes and seeks to persuade people not to eat them.

5. Weight for weight, potatoes boiled or baked contain fewer calories than cooked converted rice. USDA Handbook 8, Composition of Foods, a standard set of tables, shows at pages 41 and 42 that the caloric value of 100 grams of cooked converted rice is 116 and of 100 grams of baked potato is 98. The disparity is still more striking in the case of boiled potato (peeled or unpeeled) of which 100 grams is stated to have caloric value of 83. The same book gives the caloric value of cooked white rice as 119.

While the official statement of USDA would seem sufficient to settle the matter of relative caloric content, we have checked other standard tables. Bridges Food and Beverage Analyses, page 121, gives caloric value of boiled rice as 110. Food tables in a Canadian book, Basic Nutrition, by McHenry, give the caloric value of baked potato, 99 grams, as 97 and of converted cooked rice, 100 grams, as 120.

This seems plain enough, but the question was raised in your letter of December 24 whether the caloric content mentioned in the TV ad, potatoes versus rice, might be based on volume or per serving. The rice advertiser does not state on what basis he is making a comparison. However, the standard tables ordinarily compare nutrients in food on a weight basis, the state of the food being the same; that is, both raw, both cooked, etc. The advertiser, in this case, may understandably prefer to be vague, but he certainly leaves the impression he is talking about fairly comparable amounts of both. He says: "the same size serving of Uncle Ben's has only 88, actually 20-percent less calories."

Let's assume the words "same size serving" mean "same volume." Agriculture Handbook No. 8 at page 135 states that a cup of converted cooked rice has 204 calories. Looking for a comparable cup of potatoes, we find that the handbook shows at page 133 that 1 cup of diced boiled potato has 105 calories or not much more than half as much as the rice. A cup of diced potatoes that have been steamed or pressure cooked also has 105 calories.

So Uncle Ben's is still wrong. Either by weight or by volume, cooked potatoes have less calories than converted cooked rice. We hope the suggestion will not be made that the advertiser means just any size serving of potatoes he may have in mind against any size serving of rice he wants to name.

In that case, of course, any figure the advertiser likes, such as 20 percent less calories or 40 percent less or anything else can be used, since the advertiser could put enough potatoes in a portion to have exactly 20 or 40 percent more calories than a portion of rice selected to fit the figure. However, this is not a matter of scientific comparison but merely arithmetical sleight-of-hand. We feel sure the Commission will not permit the untrue statements of the Uncle Ben's rice people to get by on such a basis of figure juggling. The official data of USDA we have cited seems to provide a reasonable comparison.

However, the advertiser may contend he is talking about baked potato and we cite a cup of boiled or steamed potato. We admit that boiled potato has somewhat more water in it than baked, so the figures can be adjusted slightly. Handbook 8 shows the ratio of calories in baked to boiled is as 98 to 83. Therefore if the cup of potatoes were of baked potatoes, the ratio would be 105 is to X as 83 is to 98. Solving, we get 124. This figure of 124 calories for a cup of baked potatoes is still much smaller than the figure for a cup of converted rice.

6. Rice is not generally recommended for a reducing diet, but the contrary is the case. The Uncle Ben's Quick Rice advertising about which we complain lays stress on the alleged less-fattening quality of this rice and has somebody purporting to be a dietitian saying: "I recommend Uncle Ben's rice instead of even this baked potato for all my many reducing diets." In the first place, it might be mentioned that a dietitian—even if real rather than imaginary—is hardly considered to be an authority on problems of obesity and weight reduction. True authority would be a scientist with a doctorate in nutrition; or a physician who makes something of a specialty of nutrition, which is a complicated field of its own.

Treatment of obesity is occupying a great deal of attention by medical men and research scientists. They all agree on one point: that increase in the fat content of the body (as opposed to water or other content) is due to an excess of calories over expenditure of energy, that is, overindulgence in food. For example, Dr. Norman Jolliffe, of New York City, a well-known authority, says: "Obesity is invariably caused by a greater intake of calories in food than expenditure of calories as energy." (Reference: Proceedings—National Food and Nutrition Institute, December 1952, USDA Handbook 56, p. 75.) Most medical thinking is similar, though there are exceptions.

Thus, advocating the eating of a high calorie food like rice as a means of reducing and in the absence of the various related information necessary in framing any kind of a reducing diet, is medical nonsense. We do not say that rice and other cereals should not be eaten as part of a suitably determined reducing diet, but the mere recommendation of rice as a weight-reducing agent makes no sense to a real nutritionist.

On the contrary, real authorities, rather than one dreamed up by an advertising copywriter, stress the need for low-carbohydrate foods, especially low-carbohydrate vegetables, in reducing diets, though they do allow some potatoes. Thus, Dr. George L. Thorpe, writing on "Treating Overweight Patients," Journal of American Medical Association, November 16, 1957, page 1361, states: "Evidence from widely different sources, when examined in light of recent metabolism studies, seems to justify the use of high-protein, high-fat, low-carbohydrate diets for successful loss of excess weight." He states that "cereal grains are concentrated forms of food, readily assimilated by the body, containing small residue of bulk, and so may be eaten in quantities far in excess of the calorie needs without sensation of fullness." Yet Dr. Thorpe (as an exception to his low-carbohydrate rule) does advocate the use of potatoes, for he says: "For maintenance of weight in patients who have completed weight-loss programs, we use a simple rule to direct their eating. They are allowed meat with fat, vegetables, fruit without juices, and no added salt, but other seasonings to taste. They are instructed to eat their meat and fat first, using a salad seasoned to taste for variety; to follow with vegetables, including potatoes; and to complete their meal with fruit for dessert." Continuing, he says: "To illustrate the use of this rule, for dinner this evening order a rare steak, baked potato, chef's salad with Roquefort dressing, spinach, cauliflower or stringbeans, and black coffee. Eat the meat with the salad; follow with vegetables and potatoes to satisfaction; ignore the rolls and fancy dessert; drink water, black coffee, or plain tea." Dr. Thorpe, as chairman of the section on general practice at the 106th annual meeting of AMA, made these statements in his chairman's address.

Let's see what another real authority, as compared with the adman's imaginary "dietitian," has to say about weight reduction. Dr. Michael G. Wohl, in "Modern Nutrition in Health and Disease," page 775, says: "Obesity is of multiple etiology. The principal general cause of the condition, however, is imbalance between energy intake and energy output, the several factors producing this metabolic disorder resulting in a positive energy balance." He advocates (on p. 777) a well-balanced diet "high in protein, low in carbohydrate, and moderate in fat. The carbohydrate should be taken chiefly in the form of bulky fruit and vegetables of low-carbohydrate content." Dr. Wohl permits use of some cereals in his diet and also some potatoes, baked or boiled. Here, however, any cereal content is part of a total plan, and there is no suggestion that eating rice, or any other cereal, is in itself weight reducing, or, as the ad says, "less fattening."

Examples could be multiplied, indefinitely, but we shall give only one more. A diet known as the Michigan State reducing diet was developed by Dr. Margaret A. Ohlson at Michigan State College. This diet permits use of potatoes, but does not mention rice or other cereals. The diet was republished by University of Idaho Extension Service in January 1955.

We are reminded at this point of the statement of a noted authority on nutrition, Dr. Ancel Keys, of University of Minnesota, who in a forthcoming book, "Eat Well and Stay Well," page 42, will say: "Our modern diets may overly reflect the commercial interests of food processors whose advertising copywriters are sometimes more persuasive than accurate."

7. Rice is not a complete substitute for potatoes in the diet. The implication of the advertising by the Uncle Ben's rice people is that potatoes can and should be eliminated from the diet and rice substituted. The "dietitian" in the advertising recommends rice instead of potatoes; and a hand marks a big black X through the picture of a baked potato. The offending TV advertisement, therefore, in effect, asserts that rice can fully make up for any lack of potatoes.

This is untrue, as will be seen by a comparison of the nutrients in 100 grams of baked potato and 100 grams of converted cooked rice. This comparison, with all figures taken from USDA's "Agriculture Handbook No. 8," pages 41 and 42, is as follows:

Item 562, rice, converted, cooked (values calculated from a recipe) 100 grams edible portion, water 71.5 percent, food energy 116 calories, protein 2.4 grams, fat 0.1 gram, total carbohydrate 25.4 grams, fiber 0.1 gram, ash 0.6 gram, calcium 8 milligrams, phosphorus 43 milligrams, iron 0.3 milligram, vitamin A none, thiamine 0.05 milligram, riboflavin 0.01 milligram, niacin 1.1 milligram and ascorbic acid none.

Item 529, potatoes, cooked, baked, 100 grams edible portion, water 73.8 percent, food energy 98 calories, protein 2.4 grams, fat 0.1 gram, total carbohydrates 22.5 grams, fiber 0.5 gram, ash 1.2 grams, calcium 13 milligrams, phosphorus 66 milligrams, iron 0.8 milligram, vitamin A 20 I.U., thiamine 0.11 milligram, riboflavin 0.05 milligram, niacin 1.4 milligrams, and ascorbic acid 17 milligrams.

A glance at the figures shows large differences in the nutrient content of baked potato and converted rice. It is observed at once that the potato has considerable ascorbic acid and a little vitamin A, the rice none; that the potato has more ash and more fiber, that the potato has much more phosphorus, iron, and calcium than the rice, also more thiamine and riboflavin and slightly more niacin.

Perhaps it will be contended that Uncle Ben's Quick Rice does not have the same nutrient content as carried in Handbook 8. Be that as it may, it still has no ascorbic acid unles it is added, nor has it any vitamin A unless added, because these substances characteristically are not found in rice. The rice therefore is not a complete substitute for potatoes, on this account alone.

But there is also another distinction, that makes it impossible, nutritionally, to substitute one for the other. This is the fact that the potato is an alkaline, that is base-forming, food while rice is an acid-forming food. (For discussion see sec. 8.)

Potatoes also contain pectins. The nutritional significance of these substances is uncertain, but again the presence of pectins in potatoes may present another element of difference that is not to be overlooked. The statement is made at page 39, Agriculture Handbook No. 74, USDA, "Energy Value of Foods" that "also present (in potatoes) are lignin, cellulose, pentosans, pectins, and other hemicelluloses * * *." We do not have on hand data on pectin content of rice. Scientific studies of the role of pectins are continuing.

8. Potatoes have value as an alkaline food whereas rice is an acid food. Sherman, in "Essentials of Nutrition," page 118, states the approximate potential reserve alkalinity in cubic centimeters of normal alkali of 100 grams of the potato as 9. On the other hand, he states the approximate potential acidity in cubic centimeters of normal acid of 100 grams of rice as 9. Regardless of what significance may be attached to the base-forming and acid-forming character of foods, the fact remains that a difference exists, again making it incorrect to suggest in advertising that rice is a complete substitute for potatoes or vice versa.

9. Potatoes have value as a supplier of bulk for good digestion. Hosoi, Alvares, and Mann in Archives of Internal Medicine 41: 112, 1928, as quoted in "The Potato: Its Nutritive Values," page 12, Idaho State Department of Agriculture, searched for food combinations that caused high bulk or low bulk in the intestines. Foods causing the largest residues were found to be fruits, potatoes, bread, lard, butter, swiss cheese, soft-boiled eggs, raw egg albumin, milk, and lactose. The largest dry residues were produced by raw-egg albumin, potato, banana, lactose, apple, and broth. Raw bananas, prunes, and baked potatoes gave rise to bulk larger than the original meal.

Von Noorden and Salomon in "Handbuch der Ernahrungslehre," Berlin, 1920, also as quoted in "The Potato: Its Nutritive Values," page 12, report that in Germany potatoes are used for laxative purposes. It was found that the attributes of potatoes were good for reducing or eliminating the effects of constipation and putrefaction.

As pointed out on page 13 of the booklet quoted, "The most likely constituent present in foods possessing the above described laxative ability is the colloidal material pectin. It is known to be digested with difficulty, if at all, and would therefore be present in the intestine to exert its water-holding and bulk producing effects. Fitch (Dietotherapy: vol. II, "Nutrition and Diet in Health," p. 35) states that 4 percent of the dry weight of the potato is composed of pectic bodies."

While the Fitch estimate of percentage of pectic bodies in a potato has been found high, the presence of pectin in potatoes has repeatedly been confirmed as in the study reported by Potter and McComb, "Carbohydrate Composition of Potatoes—Pectin Content" (American Potato Journal, vol. 34, 1957, pp. 342–346).

10. Potatoes are of great nutritional importance in the world and in the United States. White potatoes are the largest and most valuable vegetable crop in the world. World production of this vegetable exceeds that of any other table food plant, including any cereal. Encyclopedia Britannica (as quoted in Information Please Almanac of 1959, p. 259) gives world production of potatoes in 1957 as 281,976,000 metric tons, rice as 172,100,000 metric tons. In the United States potato production is outstripped by wheat, corn, and oats, but far more potatoes are used for human food than either corn or oats. Per capita consumption of potatoes in the United States (retail weight basis) was 96.7 pounds in 1958, according to preliminary figures of the U.S. Department of Agriculture.

Contrary to the view that potatoes are merely starch and water (an idea expressed by an FTC official) potatoes are an important source of nutrients other than carbohydrates. In 1956, potatoes supplied 17.6 percent of the U.S. total of ascorbic acid (vitamin C). (Data calculated from Agriculture Handbook No. 62, supplement for 1956.) This figure is on the basis of average contribution of 17 milligrams per 100 grams edible portion of fresh uncooked potato, a figure suitable as a generality though it is recognized ascorbic acid content of potatoes varies widely, much above and below this figure.

Potatoes come near being a complete though low protein food. The main lack is fat. "It was reported 25 years ago," said C. F. Woodward and E. A. Talley of USDA Agricultural Research Administration in American Potato Journal of September 1953, pages 205–12, "that human adults were kept in nitrogen balance (that is, having enough proteins of all kinds) and in good health for as long as 5 months when fed diets consisting solely of potatoes and a small amount of fat." (See Kon and Klein, the Value of Whole Potato in Human Nutrition, Journal of Biochemistry, 1928, 22: 258–260.)

USDA points out in Energy Value of Foods, Agriculture Handbook No. 74, page 37, that while potatoes contain little protein yet "several observers have pointed out that subjects have remained in generally good physical condition for long periods on diets in which potatoes are practically the sole source of protein."

The following statement on composition of the potato is from Albritton's Standard Values in Nutrition and Metabolism prepared under the direction of the National Research Council and should put to rest the starch and water notion mentioned above: Per 100 grams of edible portion of fresh uncooked vegetable, the potato provides 83 calories of energy; it is 78 percent water; provides protein 2 grams, fat 0.1 gram, total carbohydrates 19.1 grams average with range of 18.7 to 20.8 grams, crude fiber 0.4 gram, ash 1 gram, calcium 11 milligrams average with range of 8 to 14 milligrams, chlorine 38 to 79 milligrams, cobalt 0.006 milligram, copper 0.14 to 0.17 milligram, iodine 0.004 to 0.009 milligram, iron 0.7 milligram, magnesium 24 to 27 milligrams, manganese 0.10 milligram, phosphorus 56 milligrams average with range of 40 to 60 milligrams, potassium 410 to 568 milligrams, sodium 0.8 milligram, sulfur 34 to 35 milligrams, zinc 0.02 to 0.04 milligram, vitamin A as beta-carotene 0.01 milligram (same as 17 International Units of A), ascorbic acid 17 milligrams (as a year around average) and range of 4 to 28 milligrams, niacin 1.2 milligrams average with range of 0.1 to 1.2 milligrams, riboflavin 0.04 milligram average with range of 0.03 to 0.12 milligram, thiamine 0.11 milligram average with range of 0.05 to 0.17 milligram.

The protein of potatoes contains 16 of the 18 amino acides customarily listed and includes all of the essential amino acids, that is, those which cannot be manufactured in the body. (See Amino Acid Content of Foods, Home Economics Research Report No. 4, USDA, Dec. 1957, p. 63.)

Because of its importance in the diet, the potato has been much studied by nutrition scientists. A good deal of research has been done on the ability of the body to utilize potato nutrients. A recent U.S. Department of Agriculture report (Energy Value of Foods, Agriculture Handbook No. 74, published in 1955) states that in six studies, the digestibility of total carbohydrates of potatoes ranged from 92 percent to more than 99 percent. Proteins of potatoes were found to be 74 percent digestible on the average, though this figure was considered low and tentative. It was pointed out in the report that "for 9 months one subject (deriving virtually all his protein from potato) maintained a schedule of varying activity including 3 months of hard labor, without any apparent ill effects, according to four examining physicians." The iron in the potato is 93 to 100 percent available, according to the Idaho Department of Agriculture, citing work by Peterson and Elvehjem. Further, it has been found that the vitamin thiamine in potatoes is more effective in the human body than when pure thiamine is furnished or when brown rice or lamb is eaten. (References: U.S. Agriculture Handbook No. 74; The Potato—Its Nutritive Values, Idaho Department of Agriculture, Review of the Nitrogenous Constituents of the Potato, Woodward and Talley in American Potato Journal, September 1953; Physiological Availability of Thiamine from Potatoes and from Brown Rice, Warnick and others, Journal of Nutrition, May 1956.)

The potato protein has been found in many studies to be of high biological value. For example, dried potato protein fed to pigs in Germany proved equal to meat and bone meal. The potato preparation had 76.9 percent crude protein. Tests showed that the biological value of the potato protein relative to egg protein was 81.1 percent and relative to milk protein was 83.2 percent. (Reference: Quantitative Estimation of Amino Acids in Foodstuffs—Potato Protein, paper by Kastell in Michrochimica Acta, 1957, 689–98, Vienna, Austria.)

Starch, the principal dry component of the potato, is readily hydrolyzed in the digestive tract. A study at the University of Freiberg, Switzerland, showed that potato starch was hydrolized more rapidly and completely than any of the cereal starches, that is, wheat, corn, rice, barley, rye, and oats. The hydrolyzing tests were made with enzyme amylase. (Reference: Comparative Studies on Enzymic Hydrolysis of Different Starches, Annales Paediatrici, 1953, 181, 1–16, published at Basle, Switzerland.) With meals containing potatoes, as much as 75 percent of the starch may be converted into maltose by salivary amylase within from 15 to 30 minutes. Maltose is a simpler product than starch and is readily converted by an enzyme maltase to glucose which can be used by the body in combination with various other chemicals. (Reference: Physiology of Gastro-Intestinal Tract, Bollman and Wollaeger, in Modern Nutrition in Health and Disease, p. 45.)

To put all the figures about composition of the potato in perspective, 100 grams of baked potato is about one medium peeled potato 2½ inches in diameter; while a boiled potato of that size (peeled before cooking) is about 126 grams.

Summing up general views of the nutritional value of potatoes and its place in the diet, the following quotations from authorities that will immediately be recognized as such are offered:

Maynard and Nelson in Handbook of Nutrition, American Medical Association, 1951, page 628: "Potatoes are primarily an energy food, consisting largely of starch. Approximately 10 percent of the total calories are in the form of protein of good biologic value. The potato is low in fiber and according to various investigators, it is highly digestible (92 to 99 percent). It is a significant source of iron, in that one medium-sized potato may provide as much as one-tenth of the daily requirement. As harvested, potatoes contain 12 to 35 mg. of ascorbic acid per hundred grams and thus provide a substantial amount of this vitamin. * * * The thiamine content of the potato ranges from 95 to 165 micrograms per hundred grams, which would mean from 8 to 14 percent of the adult daily requirement in a 150 gram serving (approximately the average daily consumption) if it were not for cooking losses. The potato does not supply a significant amount of riboflavin."

Sherman and Lanford in Essentials of Nutrition, page 324, state: "Potatoes and sweetpotatoes are not such 'one-sided' foods as most people probably suppose them to be. In the average of the presumably representative American family dietaries * * * it may be seen that an investment of 3 percent of the food money in this food group brought a return of 5 percent of the calories, 3 percent of the protein, 2 of calcium, 7 of the iron, 6 of the vitamin A value, 8 of the thiamine, 4 of the riboflavin and 13 percent of the vitamin C. Thus the investment in this food group brought a return which was not only large in proportion to its cost but also fairly well distributed over the different main factors in the nutritive value of the diet."

(NOTE.—Since far more white potatoes are eaten than sweetpotatoes, this refers principally to the contributions of white potatoes, except for vitamin A.)

Jensen, Man's Foods, page 58: "We have not the space here to dwell on the potato, but the common potato has exerted an influence on nutrition and history ranking in importance with corn. Old World food economies were changed drastically when the potato caught on as a staple food. The potato was considered a lowly food by Europeans, but it was rich in energy, vitamins and minerals, as the robust Irish, Scandinavians and German folk proved."

Massachusetts Agricultural Experiment Station, Bulletin 390: "Potatoes should enjoy an important place in the diet because they are good sources of vitamins B_1 and C and of iron. Furthermore, they can be considered a very economical source of these nutrients and of energy. Nutritionists are in general agreement that many American diets are low in some important nutrients including those of which potatoes are good sources. For this reason, the general use of potatoes is to be recommended particularly because of their low cost."

11. In conclusion: It would appear from the data here presented that some of the statements on the Uncle Ben's Quick Rice TV commercial have evolved from an advertising copywriter's imagination and have no basis in fact. We ask, therefore, that the Commission take action to force elimination of all reference to potatoes in the rice advertising unless the references are made to square with the nutritional facts.

Respectfully,

ALAN T. RAINS,
Executive Vice President.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL AIRPORT ACT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1) to amend the Federal Airport Act in order to extend the time for making grants under the provisions of such act, and for other purposes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk. It is intended to be proposed by Senators MAGNUSON, MONRONEY, SMATHERS, BARTLETT, ENGLE, PASTORE, and by myself. Before the amendment is reported, I wish to state that it will not affect the funds to be spent in the next fiscal year. The purpose of the amendment is to reduce the total amount of the funds authorized by the bill from $565 million to $465 million, by making it a 4-year program instead of a 5-year program. Between now and the time the authorization expires, if the amendment shall be adopted, the committee will have an opportunity to make another survey and a thorough study to determine whether the funds authorized are adequate, or whether they need to be increased or decreased.

The amendment does not save any money in the expenditures contemplated to be authorized for the first 4 years, but it does provide a cutoff date of 4 years instead of 5 years, and it provides $95 million a year for domestic allocations, and $5 million for Alaska, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands.

The bill as introduced and reported provides a 5-year program. The amendment makes it a 4-year program. It would authorize only $465 million, instead of $565 million. I ask that the amendment be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 7, after the words "June 30, 1962", it is proposed to insert the word "and"; and on lines 7 and 8 it is proposed to delete the words "and June 30, 1964."

On page 2, line 24, it is proposed to insert, after the words "June 30, 1962", the word "and"; and on lines 24 and 25, to delete the words "and June 30, 1964."

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I wish to repeat, for the benefit of some Senators who did not hear me, that the amendment does not propose to effect any reduction in the amount to be authorized for the next 4 years, but that it makes the program a 4-year program, instead of a 5-year program.

If the amendment shall be agreed to, and the bill as amended shall be passed without any further amendments, we will authorize a total of $465 million, instead of $565 million.

We hope that sometime during the next 4 years we will be able to review what has taken place and make further studies. We will then be able to take advantage of any further developments which may occur, and then determine whether we wish to increase the program or decrease it, or leave it at about the same level.

The adoption of the amendment would not affect the budget for the next year. It would not affect the expenditures for any of the first 4 years, but it would confine the authorization to 4 years, instead of 5 years, thereby reducing the amount proposed to be authorized from $565 million to $465 million.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. COTTON. I wish to be certain that I understand exactly what the distinguished majority leader has said. As I understand, his amendment would not affect the budget, because it would not affect the budget any more or less than the present committee bill would affect it. Is that what the Senator has said?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator is correct.

Mr. COTTON. In other words, under the majority leader's amendment, there still would be $165 million immediately available for fiscal 1960. Is that correct?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. There would be $100 million, and $65 million in discretionary funds, which the President may or may not use, as proposed in the bill. The Senator from New Hampshire is correct in his interpretation of my amendment. I do not wish to leave the impression that the amendment would in any way affect the amount proposed to be spent in any of the 4 years.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Has the amendment been printed?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. No; it has not been printed. Under it we would simply have a 4-year program, instead of a 5-year program. The amendment leaves the amount per annum the same, and the $65 million in discretionary funds is left the same. I understand that the chairman of the committee and the chairman of the subcommittee are willing to accept the amendment. They are the coauthors of it. If we could have the amendment adopted, we could proceed further with the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed by the Parliamentarian that the committee amendments should be considered first. Without objection, the Senate may first consider the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas on behalf of himself and other Senators. Is there objection?

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, I reserve my right to object. I should like to ask one question. So far as I am concerned I have no objection to the amendment being added to the bill, but would the acceptance of the amendment in any way preclude the offering of a substitute for the whole bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. No; it would not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would not.

Mr. COTTON. I thank the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. If it did, I would not offer it.

Mr. COTTON. I am sure the Senator would not.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I understand from the leadership on the Senator's side of the aisle that there are a number of amendments to be offered. I am sure they will be offered. Then we can agree on a time limitation for their consideration which will be satisfactory to all Members of the Senate.

Mr. COTTON. The amendment does not preclude the cutting of any specific figure in the bill. Is that correct?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. No; it merely reduces the 5 years to 4 years.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I merely wish to say that if we had had the time to do it, we probably would have submitted the amendment as a committee amendment. However, time precluded us from doing it. The majority leader and the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee and I have discussed the matter. What the majority leader has said represents our understanding. The amendment merely reduces the time from 5 years to 4 years. It has no effect on the remaining provisions of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. But it also reduces the amount to be authorized from $565 million to $465 million.

Mr. MAGNUSON. By virtue of limiting the time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That is correct.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Just to pinpoint the record, what we are in effect asked to do by unanimous consent is to modify the committee bill so far as the time is concerned.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That is correct; and insofar as the amount proposed to be authorized is concerned.

That pinpoints the matter by taking $100 million out of the amount proposed to be authorized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first committee amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 16, after the word "in", it is proposed to strike out "the Territories of."

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, the series of committee amendments being offered were adopted by the subcommittee and approved by the full Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to bring the bill as nearly in line with the proposals of the administration as it was possible to do, in the minds of the members of the subcommittee. Most of these amendments are technical in nature. They deal with proposals made by the administration and by the Federal Aviation Administrator. After studying the testimony, we felt that the proposals were good and that their adoption would improve the bill.

For that reason, I support, and I believe Senators on both sides of the aisle support, the committee amendments now in the bill. I ask the distinguished Republican members of the committee who are on the floor, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL] and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. COTTON], if that is not the case.

Mr. COTTON. Will the Senator please refresh my mind as to the amendments?

Mr. MONRONEY. The committee amendments were, first, to strike out $75 million as the amount of the discretionary funds and to substitute in lieu thereof $65 million, because we found that $10 million or $11 million will have been carried over of funds authorized under the present law.

Another amendment provides for the immediate availability of the discretionary fund of $65 million, which the bill proposes. Of course, the amount of $65 million may be subject to further amendment on the floor.

Mr. COTTON. The Senator means, does he not, that the funds will be available in fiscal 1959, and that it would not be necessary to wait until the beginning of fiscal 1960?

Mr. MONRONEY. That is correct. There is work necessary to be done immediately on certain airports for which funds are not available.

Another amendment concerns the redistribution of funds. This was included in the bill by the committee at the suggestion of the Federal Aviation Administrator, so that instead of freezing State-allocated funds for a period of 4 years, when they are not used by the States, they will revert to the discretionary fund of the administrator at the end of 2 years.

Mr. COTTON. That amendment, too, we have agreed to.

Mr. MONRONEY. Another committee amendment was not one which was suggested by the Federal Aviation Administration. It deals with interstate compacts made necessary when certain States wish to build or operate airports serving cities and towns which may lie within the boundaries of other States.

Mr. COTTON. If the Senator from Oklahoma expects to have that amendment agreed to, I think, in justice to the junior Senator from New Hampshire, he should make it perfectly clear that the people of New Hampshire suggested the amendment.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, this is the so-called Cotton amendment. I think it is a very fine amendment. The committee was very happy to include it. I think it will be useful to all States.

Another amendment is merely a technical amendment, dealing with Alaska, and bringing Alaska within the general definitions of the act.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that in connection with the consideration of the bill now under consideration, Mr. Gordon Bennett, of the Federal Aviation Commission, be accorded the privilege of the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I move that the committee amendments which I have just explained be considered en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the committee amendments en bloc?

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

The committee amendments considered en bloc are as follows:

On page 2, line 16, after the word "in", to strike out "the Territories of"; on page 3, line 5, after the word "in", to strike out "the Territory of"; in line 8, after the word "Islands", to strike out "Wherever this Act refers to Alaska as a Territory it shall be deemed to refer to the State of Alaska, and the words 'State' and 'States', as used in this Act, shall not be construed as including the State of Alaska."; in line 18, after the word "of", to strike out "$75,000,000" and insert "$65,000,000"; in line 22, after the word "obligation", to strike out "beginning July 1, 1959," and insert "upon the enactment of this subsection"; on page 5, line 6, after the word "Aviation", to strike out "Agency." " and insert "Agency."."; after line 15, to insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 8. Section 6(c) of the Federal Airport Act, as amended (49 U.S.C. 1105(c)), is further amended to read as follows:

" 'REDISTRIBUTION OF FUNDS

" '(c) Any amount apportioned for projects in a State pursuant to subsection (a) of this section which has not been obligated by grant agreement at the expiration of the fiscal year immediately following the fiscal year for which it was first authorized to be obligated shall be added to the discretionary fund established by subsection (b) of this section.' "

On page 6, after line 2, to insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 9. The Federal Airport Act, as amended, is further amended by adding a new section to read as follows:

" 'INTERSTATE COMPACTS

" 'SEC. 21. The consent of Congress is hereby given to each of the several States to enter into any agreement or compact, not in conflict with any law of the United States, with any other State or States for the purpose of developing or operating airport facilities. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this section is expressly reserved.' "

After line 11, to insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 10. Section 2(a)(12) of the Federal Airport Act, as amended (49 U.S.C. 1101(a)(12)), is further amended to read as follows:

"'(12) "State" means a State of the United States at the time of the enactment of this act, or the District of Columbia.'"

And, after line 16, to insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 11. Section 7 and section 10(c) of the Federal Airport Act, as amended (49 U.S.C. 1106 and 1109(c)), are further amended by striking out 'the Territory of Alaska' wherever the phrase appears in said sections and by inserting in lieu thereof 'Alaska'."

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 5(a) of the Federal Airport Act, as amended (49 U.S.C. 1104(a)), is further amended to read as follows:

"(a) For the purpose of carrying out this Act with respect to projects in the several States, there is authorized to be obligated by the execution of grant agreements pursuant to section 12 of this Act the sum of $40,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1956, and the sum of $60,000,000 for each of the fiscal years ending June 30, 1957, June 30, 1958, and June 30, 1959, and the sum of $95,000,000 for each of the fiscal years ending June 30, 1960, June 30, 1961, June 30, 1962, June 30, 1963, and June 30, 1964. Each such authorized amount shall become available for obligation beginning July 1 of the fiscal year for which it is authorized, and shall continue to be so available until so obligated."

SEC. 2. Section 5(b) of the Federal Airport Act, as amended (49 U.S.S. 1104(b)), is further amended to read as follows:

"(b) For the purpose of carrying out this Act with respect to projects in Alaska and Hawaii, and in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands, there is hereby authorized to be obligated by the execution of grant agreements pursuant to section 12 of this Act the sum of $2,500,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1956, and the sum of $3,000,000 for each of the fiscal years ending June 30, 1957, June 30, 1958, and June 30, 1959, and the sum of $5,000,000 for each of the fiscal years ending June 30, 1960, June 30, 1961, June 30, 1962, June 30, 1963, and June 30, 1964. Each such authorized amount shall become available for obligation beginning July 1 of the fiscal year for which it is authorized, and shall continue to be so available until so obligated. Of each of the amounts authorized by this subsection, 45 per centum shall be available for projects in Alaska, 25 per centum for projects in the Territory of Hawaii, 20 per centum for projects in Puerto Rico, and 10 per centum for projects in the Virgin Islands.

SEC. 3. Section 5 of the Federal Airport Act, as amended (49 U.S.S. 1104), is further amended by adding the following new subsection:

"DISCRETIONARY FUND

"(e) In addition to the sums authorized in subsections (a) and (b), the Administrator is authorized to obligate in his discretion the sum of $65,000,000 which shall be available to pay the United States share of costs of any approved project, and shall be administrated as a separate fund without regard to the provisions of section 6 of this Act. This sum shall become available for obligation upon the enactment of this subsection and shall continue to be available until so obligated."

SEC. 4. Section 5(c) of the Federal Airport Act, as amended (49 U.S.C. 1104(c)), is further amended by striking out "and (b)" and inserting immediately after the words "subsections (a)" a comma, and "(b) and (e) of this section."

SEC. 5. Section 13 of the Federal Airport Act (49 U.S.C. 1112), is amended by inserting "(a)" after "SEC. 13." and by adding a subsection to read as follows:

"COSTS NOT ALLOWED

"(b) With respect to amounts obligated after June 30, 1959, the cost of acquisition or construction of that part of a project intended for use as a passenger automobile parking facility, and the cost of construction of those parts of passenger or freight terminal buildings and other airport administrative buildings intended for use as bars, cocktail lounges, night clubs, theaters, private clubs, garages, hotel rooms, commercial offices, or gamerooms or such other use which, in the opinion of the Administrator, is not essential to the welfare and safety of those persons using airports for public aviation purposes, shall not be an allowable project cost under this Act."

SEC. 6. Section 2(a)(3) of the Federal Airport Act, as amended (49 U.S.C. 1101(a)(3)), is further amended by striking out "and" before "(B)" and by inserting before the semicolon following "airport hazards" a comma and the following: "and (C) the periodic seal coating of flexible airport pavements and the filing of joints in rigid airport pavements at airports at which air traffic is not sufficient to meet the criteria of the Administrator for the location of an airport traffic control tower operated by the Federal Aviation Agency."

SEC. 7. Section 4 of the Federal Airport Act, as amended (48 U.S.C. 1103), is further amended by inserting "(a)" after "SEC. 4." and by adding a subsection to read as follows:

SEC. 8. Section 6(c) of the Federal Airport Act, as amended (49 U.S.C. 1105(c)), is further amended to read as follows:

SEC. 9. The Federal Airport Act, as amended, is further amended by adding a new section to read as follows:

"INTERSTATE COMPACTS

"SEC. 21. The consent of Congress is hereby given to each of the several States to enter into any agreement or compact, not in conflict with any law of the United States, with any other State or States for the purpose of developing or operating airport facilities. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this section is expressly reserved."

SEC. 10. Section 2(a)(12) of the Federal Airport Act, as amended (49 U.S.C. 1101(a)(12), is further amended to read as follows:

"(12) 'State' means a State of the United States at the time of the enactment of this Act, or the District of Columbia."

SEC. 11. Section 7 and section 10(c) of the Federal Airport Act, as amended (49 U.S.C. 1106 and 1109(c)), are further amended by striking out "the Territory of Alaska" wherever the phrase appears in said sections and by inserting in lieu thereof "Alaska".

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, of which the distinguished senior Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON] is the chairman, asks the consideration by the Senate of the bill S. 1, which, as amended by the distinguished majority leader with the approval of the distinguished minority leader and other Senators on the minority side, now provides a 5-year, $100-million-a-year extension of the Federal-aid-to-airport grant authorization program and a $65 million emergency fund to help the Nation advance into the jet age. We recommend the passage of the bill.

A careful study over a long period of time resulted in the bill which the Senate is considering today. My subcommittee held 4 days of hearings in April 1958, on the airport situation; and after the full committee reported S. 3502, an almost identical bill, in the 85th Congress, the Senate in its wisdom passed the bill without a single vote being cast against it. After a few changes, the House passed the bill.

The President, who witheld his signature—thus, for all practical purposes, effecting a pocket veto—explained that he was convinced "that the time has come for the Federal Government to begin an orderly withdrawal from the airport grant program."

S. 1 is realistic. It was studied carefully both before and after the President's veto of last September. It represents a policy of continued support for the national airport system, rather than one of withdrawal. That is the principal issue which is before the Senate today.

I know of no member of the committee, whether a Democrat or a Republican, who went along with the administration's prime objective, namely, to withdraw completely, after a declining advance of funds, and to turn over the entire, total responsibility for the Federal airport system to the local municipalities and the States.

Some 30 or 40 witnesses testified, and only 1, the Federal Aviation Administrator, speaking for the administration, testified in favor of a withdrawal program. Rather, the testimony is quite voluminous on the part of witnesses who testified in support of the principle of Federal aid to airports on a 50–50 matching basis.

This was not true only of the mayors, of the airport operators, and of the airlines. It was true also of the Airline Pilots Association, the Aircraft Owners and Pilots Association, and the National Business Aircraft Association. It was true of all the other witnesses, including those representing labor and various civic groups.

The principal issue in the bill is whether the Federal Government will follow the demand of the administration by withdrawing Federal airport support over a period of a few years, and hand to the cities and towns a do-it-yourself kit to meet the ever-growing problems and the ever-growing traffic of the aviation industry.

Contrary to some misleading information which has been reported, the bill is not full of frills and never has been. It specifically excludes funds for bars, cocktail lounges, parking lots, shopping centers, game rooms, and the like, and gives to the administrator the decision as to whether proposed airport facilities are necessary to the safety and welfare of passengers.

There has been a deliberate attempt on the part of some persons, which apparently has emanated directly from the White House, to give the impression that the bill, because it allows the use of Federal funds in the construction of terminal buildings, will really open the back door to the construction of monumental terminal buildings with all their extraneous conveniences, to be built partly at Federal expense.

Not only it that inaccurate; it also goes directly against the specific provisions of the bill. I may say that, under the provisions of Senate bill 1, if there are constructed any facilities that are not appropriately connected with the convenience, safety, health, or accommodation of passengers in the terminal buildings, facilities other than those non-revenue-producing services which must be provided in any airport, then the administrator will have the right to exclude those facilities from the list of those for which Federal matching funds might be obtained, and it will be his duty to see that they are so excluded.

So my colleagues need have no fear that through this bill they will be buying a pig in a poke, or that they will be opening up any avenue supporting frills, fancy banquet halls, or facilities of that nature, which might be built in these terminals.

The bill is endorsed not only by all the aviation groups in the country, but also by organized labor, independent business groups, and by nonpartisan community organizations on town, city, and State levels. The Air Force Association approves the bill. It is a vast organization composed of those who have served in the Armed Forces of our country, in the Air Force. They endorse the provisions of the bill. As you can see, Mr. President, from the hearings, they expressed their strong feeling that the construction of these civil airports will have a definite, important contribution to make to our military stature, as well.

The Civil Aeronautics Board, an arm of the Congress, and partly an arm of the executive branch of the Government, told us that the advent of the jet and other high speed aircraft brings with it the need for an expanded airport program, and urged the enactment of legislation along the lines of Senate bill 1 or other appropriate legislation. The only criticism of the bill came from the official spokesmen of the administration.

Last session, the Senate and the House moved forward courageously to provide an administrative framework for safety in the skies; today—a year late—we must reenact a program approved in this Chamber last session without a dissenting vote, which will contribute to air safety on the ground from which planes must take off and to which they must return. It will profit us nothing to spend on gearing up our skyways and to stint on the ground facilities to accommodate our booming air traffic, to expedite air travel, and to insure the welfare and safety of air passengers.

Today, I am asking the Senate to vote to have the Federal Government share 50–50 with local communities, at an increased pace, the costs of preparing the Nation for an air age which offers infinite possibilities for the Nation's economy, its defense, and for all its people.

Let us, in the great American tradition, cease to regret our yesterdays; let us be Americans, and tool up for tomorrow.

Mr. President, this bill is of considerable importance as an emergency measure. The States and the municipalities had nothing whatsoever to do with the development of high speed, high performance aircraft; but today such aircraft are rapidly becoming a part of our great transportation system. Part of that is the outgrowth of development work done by the military. If the Federal Government does not participate in this program, then there will be grave defects in our national airport system, which was already stretched to the very limits in handling the traffic which was in the air 3 years ago, and still is being stretched to the limit in order to accommodate the ever-increasing numbers of planes of that type. But today we have more new planes, and there is a great demand for lengthened runways, for parallel runways in hub airports, and for similar improvements. The only way more traffic can be squeezed into these facilities, many of which were constructed 30 or 35 years ago to accommodate the old DC–3's, is to construct the modern facilities which will be made possible by this measure. This is why I so strongly feel that there is a Federal responsibility in connection with this matter.

A program adopted about 1912 provided for joint responsibility, on a 50–50 matching basis between the Federal Government and the various States, for the construction of the Federal highway system. That program was an important contribution to the growth of our country and its communications and its transportation system; and that program has been carried out by the Government since 1912. A few years ago it was improved, when we added the superhighway system. Let me point out that I voted for that bill. That program of highway construction will, when completed, have cost us approximately $38 billion. But I call attention to the fact that today the Government, in connection with construction of the interstate highway system, is matching States appropriations on the basis of a 90 percent Federal contribution and 10 percent State contribution.

Mr. President, in the case of this airport bill, we are not asking for $38 billion. We are not asking for matching funds on the basis of a 90-percent Federal contribution and a 10-percent State contribution. Instead, by means of this bill, we are asking for an amount equal to 1½ percent, or even less than that, of the $38 billion being spent under the highway program. We are asking that this amount be made available for the airport program, but not on the basis of a 90-percent contribution by the Federal Government and a 10-percent contribution by the States. Instead, we ask that the matching formula remain on the basis of a 50–50 contribution.

Mr. President, today, aviation is carrying more traffic between distant points, on long hauls, than are all the railroads of our country. The airlines are reaching out to serve the small centers to which railroad service has been discontinued. From our major airports, American-flag aircraft takeoff to the four corners of the world. Can we say that the facilities at such airports are matters of purely local responsibility, when, at most of the airports, almost 90 percent of the passengers—by actual count—are traveling in interstate commerce? Yet, Mr. President, those who favor a complete withdrawal of Federal support from this program would say that an airport is solely the responsibility of, say, Cincinnati, Ohio, or Williamsport, Pa., or Tulsa, Okla. Mr. President, I believe that the Congress must accept partial responsibility for this program; and that is what Senate bill 1 provides.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield to my distinguished colleague, the ranking Democratic member on the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. PASTORE. First of all, I should like to commend my distinguished colleague on the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee for his devotion and industry in reporting the bill in the fashion he has. Since the very tragic accident in the East River in New York this past week, the American people have become especially conscious of the safety of our airports, both in takeoff and in landing. I should like to ask if this bill will provide in any way for safety equipment to avoid such accidents or make them less likely in the future.

Mr. MONRONEY. The bill will, but may I say that any airline pilot, or anyone who flies consistently, will confirm the statement that 70 to 80 percent of accidents to aircraft occur within the vicinity of a landing field. The critical point in flying is in takeoff and landing.

The pending bill amends and extends the act, providing funds for runway lights, approach lights, and equipment of that kind, when the funds are matched on at least a 50–50 basis by local sources.

This morning, on the Dave Garroway program, the vice president of the airline pilots' organization was interviewed and asked about the tragic wreck which occurred off Rikers Island, near La Guardia Airport, a few days ago, an accident which cost the lives of so many. He analyzed what he thought were the difficulties and the problems involved. Of course, he reserved his final opinion as to what caused the accident.

When he was asked what he thought could be done to prevent that kind of accident from ever happening again, he said, "Write your Representatives and Senators in Congress and ask them to pass the Federal aid to airports bill now pending in the Senate and the House." It was a pilot who said that and, of course, the airline pilots testified at our hearings to that effect.

I do not know what problems the pilot approaching La Guardia Airport had confronting him at the time of the tragic accident. He was approaching under sleet, ice, and rainy conditions. He broke out of an overcast at 400 feet. He had less than a minute to line up the airplane with the runway. He was coming in on the dark side of runway 22. That means the lighting on the other side of the field was not available to him, because the Federal Aviation Administrator has not been able to get the Defense Department to agree to allow approach lights to be put in the channel approaching that runway. If such lights had been in operation, the pilot would have had perfect lighting conditions, with a beacon finger pointing him to a safe landing.

It must be remembered that the pilot had to cope with conditions which included sleet and a 400-foot overcast, a plane flying at 300 miles an hour, slowing to a speed of 100 miles an hour for landing, and having to touch down on a runway length of 4,900 feet. Under conditions of that kind, a pilot is bound to be under nervous tension. There is a great difference between conditions when a pilot knows he is landing on a field of adequate length and conditions when he knows that every single movement of his plane coming to the touchdown on the runway must be timed to the split second and to the exact yardage, or he will overrun his field.

It is obvious that the fact of airplanes requiring longer runways must be recognized by Federal law, and there must be a Federal responsibility for providing longer runways. The cities are required to build airports according to the Federal Aviation Administrator's instructions. They are not masters of runway lengths. The Federal Aviation Administrator is the master. But the city has to put up 50 percent of the money, or more, to provide for that kind of safety.

It seems to me we would be in a very peculiar situation if we allowed a Federal agency to require an airport to increase the length of its runways and then said, "Here is a do-it-yourself kit, the Federal Government has no further responsibility."

Mr. PASTORE. Did I correctly understand the Senator to say the pilots' association has endorsed the bill?

Mr. MONRONEY. It has not only endorsed it, but pilots testified quite pointedly on the very matter we are discussing at this time, the need for approach lights. There was included in last year's report on the airport bill a recommendation which we felt would have the effect of directing the Federal agency to make the necessary expenditures whenever there was found to be any reluctance or unusual local delay in acquiring easements or other rights for the construction of approach lights. We thought the agency should itself acquire these rights and charge the cost to the airport. We tried to break that bottleneck.

Mr. President, since it is so important, I ask unanimous consent that the part of the report on last year's bill, S. 3502, recommending the immediate acquisition of high intensity lighting facilities which make aircraft approaches so much safer, be included in the RECORD at this point. I also ask that when other additions to the report on S. 1 are completed, that this material be included as a section of the report. It was inadvertently left out of the report.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, of course we want to have that information in the RECORD at this point, and I wish to commend most highly the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma for his work in this field. However, in order that the RECORD may be clear, and before agreeing to the insertion of the information, in view of what has been said in the colloquy which has taken place on the floor, I should like to ask the Senator from Oklahoma—and I know he will correct me if he has contrary authentic information—if the information from the Federal Aviation Agency states that at the LaGuardia Airport, where the most unfortunate and lamentable accident recently happened, the extended lighting facilities, which the Senator from Oklahoma has just described so well and so accurately, have been on order, have been ready to be provided out of appropriations which have nothing to do with aid to airports, but out of appropriations for general navigation aids. The only reason why the lights were not operating on the night the accident took place is that New York City has not been able to arrange permission for and get authority to extend the lights into the channel because of possible interference with navigation. It was that technical matter which was holding up installation. If that statement is incorrect, I want to know it.

I also wish to know if the Senator intended to indicate that the presence or absence of money in the aid-to-airport program had any bearing on the accident which took place in New York. It is my understanding that matter emphasizes something else very definitely. It emphasizes the responsibility of the Federal Government to pour money into such aids, if necessary, and let nothing interfere with navigational aids, which is another field, and involves another appropriation, and which we all ardently support to the fullest extent.

Before inserting the material in the RECORD, will the Senator indicate his understanding on the question?

Mr. MONRONEY. Yes. I tried to explain that. We are in agreement as to the difficulty of installing approach lights at La Guardia. The difficulty lies in clearing the right-of-way for the lights to rest in the channel of the river. I mentioned that the Defense Department is one of the agencies holding up the installation of navigational lights in the channel. I should like to point out that these lights are important.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Of course, the real difficulty, with which the bill is concerned, is the matter of the entire efficiency of the airport, including the length of the runway and the lights. The real trouble in that instance was that when the airport was built the City of New York Port Authority did not have enough money, or did not think it had enough money, to make the runway adequate.

Mr. MONRONEY. The Senator is correct. However, there are two 4,900-foot runways. Those runways are absolutely inadequate for anything other than the DC–3's or DC–4's.

Mr. MAGNUSON. It is like having a 1920 garage for modern cars.

Mr. MONRONEY. There has been a great deal of trouble on hot days in getting the DC–6's off the ground at La Guardia. Flights have been canceled when the temperature was high because it was not possible to get the DC–6's off the runway.

Mr. President, one of the greatest hazards to any airline, as any airline pilot or private pilot will be glad to state, is bringing the plane down on a runway which is too short to take care of the plane. When planes come in through fog, sleet, and darkness, to land on a 4,900-foot runway, whether it be at La Guardia, or Manchester, N.H., or any other place, it is dangerous, and the pilot is going to be very nervous. The chances for error are multiplied manyfold as the runway shrinks, due to lack of visibility. All of this increases the margin for error.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, I am sure we all agree on objectives, and that the Senator recalls our discussion in both the subcommittee and the full committee, and that the Senator agrees it is vitally necessary that the runways of this country be of sufficient length to insure safety. It will be the purpose of the Senate and of the Congress, as well as of the present administration, to see to it that aid is furnished to provide safety. The only question is the extent of the aid to be provided in the bill.

Before agreeing that the Senator may insert in the RECORD the item to which he has referred, I should like to make a comment. It has been specifically reported that the recent unfortunate accident was caused by the lack of a particular lighting facility. The Senator from Oklahoma himself has given information on that point to the Senate very clearly, yet it has not been indicated that there has been any denial of an extension of the length of the runway. There should not be an effort to write into the RECORD early in the debate some highly prejudicial information from a perfectly sincere pilot who said, in effect, "Write your Congressman to indicate that something the Congress has refused to do, or is taking time to consider doing, should be done."

With regard to the particular accident under discussion, I think that is an appeal to the emotions, rather than an appeal to reason, and it should not be permitted.

I have no objection to the insertion.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL and Mr. MAGNUSON addressed the Chair.

Mr. MONRONEY. If the Senators do not mind, I should like to answer my distinguished friend.

Certainly I had no intention to indicate there was one single reason for the accident. I did not intend to do that, because I do not know all the facts. What I said was that the lack of a high intensity approach lighting system was one of the factors involved, and in the case of that type of item the Federal Government does pay for the entire cost of purchase, and the installation.

There is another thought I should like to put into the RECORD, because it bears on the recent accident, and the making of any runway safer. The only contribution which is requested from local authorities in this regard is for purchase of the land or property interest therein. The committee was particularly impressed with hearing testimony as to the essentiality of a uniform pattern of approach lights and the installation of such lights at the earliest possible time. It was urgently suggested that local authorities make every effort to cooperate with the Federal Agency in having the lights installed. In those instances in which the air safety required the installation by local authorities, when the local authorities did not cooperate in making a proper lighting system available, the Civil Aeronautics Administration, it was felt, would be justified in acquiring such necessary land and insisting that the cost thereof be applied against future allocations for airport development at that particular airport. In other words, the committee suggested to the local authorities, on the question of approach lighting, that you do it, or we will.

There are many airports, such as Chicago Midway, where the approach lighting is a matter of beer-joint signs and other neon lights, such as those running up and down Cicero Avenue, instead of beacons alined in a scientific and uniform pattern. If a pilot has to adjust his landing at every airport to a different style and a different type of approach lighting, we will have many more accidents.

Certainly that was a contributing factor in the accident at New York a few days ago. The inadequacy of approach lighting must have been a contributing factor.

The length of the runway is always an important factor, no matter what the weather. The worse the weather, the greater is the danger factor. The higher the performance of the aircraft, the higher the danger factor.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. MAGNUSON. The able Senator in his speech has constantly referred to the cities making application. I should like to have the RECORD show that the bill also provides that a county or a port authority may make application. In many cases these items for the big airports are handled by them. It is clear in the bill that the application may come from any duly constituted local division of government.

Mr. MONRONEY. The Senator is correct. I should like to point out that that is a very important part of the bill.

Mr. MAGNUSON. A State may also apply. In some places there are State authorities.

Mr. MONRONEY. The Senator is correct.

Mr. MAGNUSON. In some places the counties have control.

Mr. MONRONEY. We also put in the provision regarding interstate compacts. We think the idea of regional airports should be encouraged. On page 27 of the report it is stated:

ENCOURAGING REGIONAL AIRPORTS

The committee has noted with satisfaction various examples of airport development on an intercounty or regional basis whereby one field is used to serve the aviation needs of several communities. As examples of such cooperative planning, Mr. Coffee, of the National Association of County Officials, cited the Mercer County (N.J.) Airport which serves 13 municipalities, and the nearby Allentown-Bethlehem-Easton Airport in Pennsylvania.

It should be more than obvious that regional airport requirements can most often be met more efficiently and economically through 1 large, modern field than by having 3 or 4 or 10 smaller, rundown terminals serving separate municipalities, each with a relatively small tax base upon which to rely. In many instances, this combining of resources has made it possible for small communities to obtain local feeder-transport service where, separately, they would have been completely unable to support a field which would accommodate passenger transport aircraft. We believe that more should be done to encourage such cooperative efforts, and that the Agency should take positive action toward stimulating local officials to adopt this type of forward-looking planning. For example, Agency representatives might be sent to address local civic and business groups on the desirability of regional airport planning and to assist, when appropriate, in the development of such plans.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I should like to ask the Senator one more question. I have been reading, as all Senators have, that the bill presently under consideration is one of the so-called money spending bills. It does cost money to build airports, and in some cases the Federal responsibility is greater than in other cases. I think we have arrived at a fair and equitable solution, or at least an equitable goal for Federal responsibility.

The bill is also going to save us a little money, is it not? Would not the enactment of the bill save us money in case of a national emergency or in case of a need for national defense? The big, modern, efficient airports around the country are an asset. If we did not have them we would have to spend perhaps twice as much as the bill provides simply to take care of the military aircraft, and commercial aircraft on military missions.

Mr. MONRONEY. The Senator is absolutely correct. It would be absolutely impossible to supply our forces overseas unless we had the major airports, both interior and coastal, to serve as jumping-off places.

Mr. MAGNUSON. If the airports are not efficient we will be faced with demands for greater appropriations for the big jets.

Mr. MONRONEY. Many of our airports would not be usable.

Mr. MAGNUSON. And for the B–52's someplace else. There has to be a provision of airports.

Mr. MONRONEY. As a matter of fact, 257 of our principal airports are today used by military aircraft, and these aircraft use them to a substantial degree.

I also point out, in connection with the Federal investment in these facilities, that while all other aircraft pay a landing fee, the Federal Government, unless it is a constant user of the service, enjoys free landing privileges.

During World War II there were even more than 257 civilian airports that were practically completely taken over by the military for training operations. It would be impossible to expect an obsolete airport system to be at all useful with the present type of military aircraft.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Let me make one further observation. The more efficient the airport is in every respect, including landing and unloading—and we hope this bill will provide such facilities—the better it can handle any commodity it is designed to handle.

We hear a great deal about the Post Office deficit. I made a quick calculation. It seems to me that we could save $10 or $15 million a year by making airports efficient to handle 70 percent of our mail, whereas now many of them are anything but efficient because of local restrictions.

I think the Post Office Department might save even more. The day is not far distant when 98 percent of the mail will be transported by truck or air, for good and sufficient reasons. Improvement of existing airports would save the Post Office Department a great deal of money and enable it to handle the mail more efficiently. The terminal facilities at most airports are so inefficient that different buildings must be used, and the mail must be handled three or four times. I believe that improvement of such facilities would save a great deal of money.

Mr. MONRONEY. The Senator is absolutely correct. I am glad he mentioned that point. Terminal facilities at some airports are so inadequate that the mail must be taken to town, a distance of 5 or 10 miles, to the central post office, to be resorted and redispatched and sent back to the airport to be transported by air. The Senator has touched upon a very important point; namely, that of speeding up the mail and saving money. Adequate facilities are not available at most of our airports, because the terminals are so crowded.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I am happy to yield to the ranking minority member of the committee, who has been so much interested in aviation, and in drafting a bill to be brought to the floor of the Senate.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Coming to the question before the Senate, the request of the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma, he has done a magnificent job. Reserving the right to object—and I shall not object—I should like to make some observations and ask a few questions.

I appreciate what has been said by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. COTTON], the ranking minority member of the subcommittee, and what he has brought out with respect to the unfortunate accident at New York.

The Senator has mentioned a television program this morning, wherein a very distinguished—and I am sure sincere—representative of the Pilots' Association made some reference to getting in contact with Senators and Representatives on this subject. Unfortunately I did not have the privilege of listening to that program. Another assignment this morning prevented me from doing so.

Let me ask the distinguished Senator if, in that program, it was brought out that, according to the press reports—and I know not whether they are correct or not—one of the survivors made a statement—and I do not know whether that is reported correctly or not; I am assuming it was—in which he pointed out that difficulty was experienced with the altimeter installed in that type of plane.

In that program reference was also made to pilot failures in estimating distances when coming in for a landing over water. I wonder if that was pointed out.

I know that the agency investigating this accident will be efficient and thorough. We ought to have the minutest details, because lives were lost. I rather suspect that when we get the full facts we may find that certain changes will have to be made in this type of aircraft, to enable experienced pilots better to calculate and adjust their positions within a fraction of a minute or a few seconds, to meet an emergency situation.

Mr. MONRONEY. I agree. I refuse to speculate on the cause. When I stood here with the fine support of the distinguished ranking Republican on the committee, to urge the creation of the Federal Aviation Agency, we talked about the subject of money for experimentation to enable us to achieve positive air control for zero-zero landings, which would be almost automatic. However, that is for the future. Today we must make do with what we have in the way of navigational aids. Unfortunately all such aids were not available for the approach landing in the case referred to. The altimeter might have been wrong. But if the lighting system had been in operation the pilot might have gotten in.

Finally, when we sum it all up—the little black box, radar, radio beacons, and so forth—the ultimate object of a pilot is to get the three wheels down on terra firma. Airports must be extended. Everything we are spending is designed to bring the plane into a safe land harbor.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I thoroughly agree with the Senator, but I would not want to leave the RECORD open to the interpretation by millions of people who might have been listening, that the Congress or the Federal Aviation Agency was remiss in fulfilling some responsibility that could have prevented the accident. It has been brought out here that every safeguard has been urged, and every application has been considered from the safety standpoint, all to the end of making travel by air safer, more practical, and more expeditious.

Mr. MONRONEY. I did not have the good fortune to hear the program to which the Senator refers, because as the Senator knows, we were quite busy in the Senate until a late hour last night, and I do not get up very early after a late session of the Senate. Those who saw the program tell me that neither the Congress nor the Federal Agency was blamed, but that it was emphasized that greater safety should be provided in the future by more adequate landing fields and airports than we have today.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I could not agree more thoroughly with the Senator. I would not have interrupted him had I not thought some of these points should be emphasized and kept in proper perspective.

I have no objection to the insertion in the RECORD of the material presented by the Senator from Oklahoma.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oklahoma?

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Excerpt from Rept. No. 1556, 85th Cong., 2d sess.]

UNIFORM APPROACH LIGHT SYSTEM

During the course of the hearings, the attention of the committee was invited to the desirability of achieving a uniform approach light system, comparable to that in operation at the Newark Airport, at all principal airports throughout the country. These lights are located off the ends of runways, and while not directly connected with airport projects covered by the Airport Act, nevertheless constitute an important safety factor which should be adopted in as many locations as feasible. Following the hearings the committee was informally advised that under present circumstances the Civil Aeronautics Administration pays for the full cost of equipment utilized in the approach light system. This Federal agency also pays for necessary construction as well as for site preparation. The only contribution requested of local authorities is either the land or a property interest therein. Because the committee was particularly impressed with testimony as to the essentiality of a uniform pattern of approach lights and their installation at the earliest possible time, it is urgently suggested that local authorities make every effort to cooperate with the Federal agency in having them installed. In instances where air safety requires their installation, but where local authorities do not cooperate in making the land available, the Civil Aeronautics Administration would be justified in acquiring such land and withholding the cost thereof from future allocations for airport development at such airport.

Mr. MONRONEY. The pilots are the ones facing all these problems in the air. Capt. J. D. Smith, of the Airline Pilots Association, who is an expert on aviation safety, appeared before our committee. He had previously testified. In the hearings last year, he called attention to the need for better approach-landing facilities. He said:

No one disputes the fact that our present airports * * * still are incapable of meeting even our present needs efficiently and safely * * *.

Three years ago we gave a paper in Boston which, in effect, said that, operationally speaking, we do not have a good airport in the United States.

In summation, we urge that the modernization of our airports be elevated to its proper position with respect to the total aviation facilities problem. In view of the time required to develop plans and efficiently improve our airports, it is believed that the urgency of this matter cannot be overstated. Consequently, we urge immediate favorable consideration of the legislation proposed.

Captain Smith's statement is found on pages 321 to 325 of the hearings.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. COTTON. I listened to the very able and interesting evidence of Captain Smith. I have been impressed in the past few minutes—as I am always impressed—by the grasp which the able chairman of the subcommittee has of this subject.

None of us wishes to speculate. It has been clearly demonstrated in the past few minutes that the importance of navigational safeguards, including runways and other facilities, cannot be overemphasized. As the Senator from Oklahoma has said, the object is to get the three wheels down on an adequate runway.

Mr. MONRONEY. And be able to walk away from the airplane.

Mr. COTTON. Yes. Captain Smith said that we should use the proposed appropriation for navigational safeguards, runways, and so forth, and that the last use should be for terminals. If we had had a marble palace as a terminal building in New York, it would not have prevented the unfortunate accident which occurred there recently. The Senator has very ably brought out that point. We wish to make sure not only that enough dollars are provided, but that they are directed to the vital program of safety first.

I know the Senator agrees with that.

Mr. MONRONEY. I agree with that. That is why we have $65 million in discretionary funds in the bill for the use of the Federal Aviation Administrator when a project cannot be covered by money specifically allocated to the State. In that case he would have discretionary power to spend the money wherever it was most needed. That is all in the way of advancing a safety program. We do not want to wait for another year to do this. We want to have funds available with which to eliminate deathtraps.

I should like to ask unanimous consent that there may be printed at this point in the RECORD certain excerpts and tables from the report accompanying S. 1. I do this in order to conserve the time of the Senate. I commend the information to the reading of all Senators, because it is very carefully documented with statistical data as to each State.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PURPOSE OF THE BILL

The Federal Airport Act, which authorizes the obligation of $63 million annually on a matching fund basis expires at the close of the present fiscal year, June 30, 1959.

The purpose of the bill is (1) to extend the act through fiscal year 1964 at an increased level of $100 million annually; (2) to provide a separate, special fund of $65 million for immediate discretionary allocation on a matching fund basis, effective on the enactment of this bill; (3) to eliminate parking lots, restaurants, bars, cocktail lounges, and other concession areas in terminal buildings from eligibility for Federal matching funds under the provisions of the act; (4) to provide Federal assistance on a matching fund basis to certain small airports for the sealing and filling of joints on runway pavements; (5) to require publication by January 1 each year of the proposed program of airport development for the next fiscal year; (6) to provide for the advance consent of the Congress to compacts between the States for the purpose of developing and operating airport facilities; (7) to provide that Federal funds allocated to a State under the apportionment formula which are unused for 2 fiscal years shall become available for discretionary allocation by the Administrator.

ADMINISTRATIVE JURISDICTION

When the Federal Airport Act was originally enacted and approved in 1946 (Public Law 377, 79th Cong., 60 Stat. 170), its administration was entrusted to the Secretary of Commerce. Its stated purpose was "to bring about, in conformity with the national airport plan prepared and from time to time revised as provided in this act, the establishment of a nation-wide system of public airports adequate to meet the present and future needs of civil aeronautics."

In 1958, under the provisions of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958, the Congress transferred the duties and functions of the Secretary of Commerce as to the administration of the Federal Airport Act to the Administrator of the newly created Federal Aviation Agency which came into being on January 1, 1959. Accordingly, Federal responsibility for airport development will be discharged by the Administrator of the Federal Aviation Agency.

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

Section 1 of the bill extends the authority to obligate Federal funds for airport projects in the continental United States for 5 additional years (fiscal years 1960 through 1964), in the amount of $95 million annually.

Section 2 of the bill extends the authority to obligate Federal funds for airport projects in the State of Alaska, and in Hawaii, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands for 5 additional years (fiscal years 1960 through 1964), in the amount of $5 million annually.

Section 3 of the bill authorizes discretionary obligation of an additional $65 million, with the authority effective upon enactment of the bill and continuing until this amount is obligated. These discretionary funds are not required to be apportioned among the States in any specific ratio.

Section 4 of the bill makes a technical amendment to the act to authorize appropriations for the obligation authority granted in section 3.

Section 5 of the bill prohibits grant of Federal funds for acquisition or construction of any part of an airport project intended for use as a parking lot, bar, hotel, or similar concession. It also permits the Administrator, in his discretion, to refuse Federal funds for any item which is not essential to the welfare and safety of the traveling public.

Section 6 of the bill permits grants of Federal funds, on a matching basis, for the periodic seal-coating or filling of joints in airport pavements at small airports which do not generate sufficient traffic to warrant installation of a traffic control tower.

Section 7 of the bill requires that the Administrator publish by January 1 the proposed airport program for the forthcoming fiscal year.

Section 8 of the bill provides that funds allocated to a State which are not used within 2 fiscal years shall be added to the Administrator's discretionary funds.

Section 9 of the bill gives the advance consent of Congress to agreements between States for the development and operation of airport facilities.

Sections 10 and 11 of the bill make certain technical amendments in the act to permit the State of Alaska to participate in the airport program on the same basis as it did prior to statehood, thus permitting a Federal contribution of up to 75 percent of the cost of a project.

ACTION IN THE 85TH CONGRESS

During the 2d session of the 85th Congress in May 1958, this committee recommended the enactment of a similar bill, S. 3502, which proposed to continue the Federal Airport Act at an increased level of $100 million through fiscal year 1963 (S. Rept. 1556, 85th Cong., 2d sess.). That bill also provided for a special fund of $75 million for discretionary allocation in fiscal year 1959. The only opposition to it was expressed by the Under Secretary of Commerce for Transportation. On May 14, 1958, the Senate approved the bill, S. 3502, without a dissenting vote. After further hearings were conducted by the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, some changes were made in the bill by the House in which the Senate concurred and it was forwarded to the President for approval in the closing days of the 85th Congress.

The President withheld approval of S. 3502 and on September 2, 1958, issued a memorandum of disapproval in which he stated in pertinent part:

"Now, however, I am convinced that the time has come for the Federal Government to begin an orderly withdrawal from the airport grant program * * * I recognize that there will doubtless be a transitional period during which the Federal Government will be required to provide aid to urgent airport projects which are essential to an adequate national aviation facilities system and which cannot be completed in any other way. * * * At the next session of the Congress the administration will recommend a transitional program to provide aid for the construction of urgent airport projects that are essential to an adequate national aviation facilities system."

In his budget message for 1960, delivered to the Congress on January 19, 1959, the President disclosed the broad outline of the proposed program for orderly withdrawal as one which would provide $65 million of new obligation authority in fiscal year 1960 with declining amounts of $55 million, $45 million, and $35 million in each of the following 3 fiscal years.

On January 21, 1959, a draft bill to accomplish the administration's proposal was forwarded to the committee and was made part of the record of the hearings. It was introduced by request on January 23 as S. 674.

Except for Mr. E. R. Quesada, Administrator of the Federal Aviation Agency, no witness appeared before the committee in support of S. 674. Two communications endorsing it in general terms were received by the committee following the close of the hearings from the Association of American Railroads and the American Farm Bureau and appear in the record of the hearings.

BACKGROUND OF THE FEDERAL AIRPORT ACT

As noted, the Federal Airport Act was first enacted in 1946 for the purpose of assisting in the development and establishment of a nationwide system of airports adequate to meet the present and future needs of civil aeronautics. A national plan for the development of public airports in the United States, its Territories and possessions, was directed to be prepared annually.

Federal funds in a total amount of $520 million were authorized to be granted to

State and local authorities for the development of public airports over a period of 7 fiscal years beginning with the fiscal year ending June 30, 1947. The apportionment formula, based on population and area, which had been used in the administration of the Federal highway program was adapted to the airport program. Seventy-five percent of the Federal funds appropriated under the provisions of the Federal Airport Act was allocated to the States by this formula. The remaining 25 percent was authorized to be allocated on a discretionary basis without regard to State boundaries. The original act provided that the amount to be authorized, or appropriated, in any single fiscal year could not exceed the sum of $100 million.

The authorization under the original act expired June 30, 1953. Because of the time required for the development of sound airport projects by State and local authorities, the act was amended in 1950 so as to extend the period of availability of authorized funds to June 30, 1958 (64 Stat. 1071).

While the program was initiated for the first full fiscal year of 1947 with an appropriation of $45 million, annual appropriations thereafter declined until fiscal year 1954 when no funds whatever were appropriated. It appears that early in 1953 the Secretary of Commerce decided that no further funds should be requested for the program until a complete study had been concluded in order to determine whether there was a definite need for continuing Federal assistance in the development of a nationwide system of public airports. The Secretary appointed a study group which late in 1953 recommended that the Federal Government should continue its participation in the development of public airports to serve civil aviation (S. Doc. No. 95, 83d Cong., 2d sess.). As a result, the airport program was renewed by an appropriation of $22 million in the Supplemental Appropriations Act of 1955 (Public Law 63, 83d Cong.).

This completely unsatisfactory record of annual appropriations, which kept local authorities in a state of uncertainty from one year to another as to the intention of the Federal Government, led the Congress to amend the basic act in 1955 so as to authorize a definite amount of $63 million for obligation in each of the fiscal years 1956, 1957, 1958, and 1959 and to remain available until expended (Public Law 211, 84th Cong.).

It is important to observe that appropriations to date have not equaled the $520 million goal established by the original act in 1946. In fact, if the program were to terminate at the close of fiscal year 1959, the total amount obligated, or remaining to be obligated, would fall short of the 1946 goal by some $54 million. The funds made available for obligation and actually obligated from fiscal year 1947 through 1959, inclusive, under existing law, are set forth in the following chart:

Net project funds available for obligation, grant agreements, and cash expenditures, by fiscal years, 1947–59

It will also be seen from the foregoing table that the total of grant agreements under the program is more than the actual expenditures of the Federal Government to date, which total only $314.8 million from the beginning of the program through fiscal year 1959.

NEED FOR EXTENSION OF THE ACT

The need and desirability of continuing a program of Federal assistance to State and local authorities, on a matching fund basis, for the development of an adequate system of public airports is almost self-evident. Air transportation has become a principal means of interstate commerce for persons, freight, and mail, carrying more passengers than railroads and transatlantic steamships. Since the enactment of the Federal Airport Act in 1946 there has been an explosive growth of air commerce of all kinds which already overtaxes airport facilities, not only because of increased numbers of active aircraft but also because of their speed, weight, design, and capacity.

Since 1946 the total number of civil aircraft has increased from 10,000 to 67,153. Since 1946 the number of airborne passengers has quadrupled from 12 million to approximately 50 million.

Significantly, the greatest growth in civil aviation has been in general aviation, which excludes commercial air carriers. Thousands of business organizations and individuals have come to depend on air travel. Today business enterprises own and operate more than 26,000 aircraft, which now range from single-engine aircraft to DC–3's, turbo-prop Viscounts and F–27's, and which will soon be supplemented by jet aircraft. The National Business Aircraft Association, representing the business aircraft fleet, emphasized that "the business community of the United States is directly affected by the existence of a sound airport development and modernization program" and unhesitatingly stated to this committee that "we urge that Senate bill 1 be given favorable consideration • • • within the earliest possible time."

Today the general aviation fleet—including these business aircraft—exceeds 65,000 aircraft and, according to a forecast made by the Civil Aeronautics Administration, will grow to 89,000 by 1965, and to 107,000 by 1970.

The same forecast indicates that airborne passengers carried by our commercial air fleets will increase to 66 million by 1960, 93 million by 1965, and 118 million by 1970.

Airfreight quadrupled in volume during the period from 1946 to 1957. The CAA predicted that aircargo traffic will increase to 600 million ton-miles by 1960, and to 1.6 billion tor-miles by 1970. It is quite obvious from this forecast that airfreight is still in its infancy.

Such an increased volume of airline and general aviation traffic necessarily results in a tremendous increase of arrivals and departures at airports through which will flow more and more of this Nation's interstate travel and commerce. Obviously, therefore, airport capacity must be kept in balance with the phenomenal growth in the use of our Federal airways.

The importance and essentiality of adequate airport facilities has been emphasized, in the past, by several special Presidential study groups. For example, in June 1955 the President's Commission on Intergovernmental Relations made a monumental report, one section of which dealt exclusively with airports. This Commission recommended that the Federal-aid airport program be continued because of considerations of both interstate commerce and national defense, which require the active and continuing participation of the National Government in airport development. That Commission stated in pertinent part:

"Termination of the Federal-aid program in favor of a system relying entirely upon State and local financing would not be in the national interest or in the interest of most State and local governments. A collection of individual State programs would not guarantee the maintenance of a national system of adequate public airports dovetailed to the needs of interstate commerce and national defense. Furthermore, the device of Federal grants-in-aid facilitates central control of airport design, thus contributing to the safety of civil aviation. In addition, the National Government enjoys free landing rights for military aircraft on airports federally assisted. Occasionally this arrangement makes it unnecessary to build additional military airfields."

Again, in 1957, in a special report to the President on aviation facilities planning, Mr. Edward P. Curtis stated:

"Airports are an integral part of the system of aviation facilities. However, unlike other elements of the system, airports are designed, built, financed, and operated by local authorities. The increase in overall traffic will require a modernization of airports and an increase in their numbers. This imposes the necessity for coordinated national and local effort to insure that airports do not become a neglected element of the system, and thus be a future bottleneck."

As was stated last year, the committee is convinced that the capital investment required to bring airport facilities up to the present and future air transportation needs of this Nation is far beyond the financial capacity and capabilities of local communities without continued effective assistance and encouragement from the Federal Government.

The principal source of funds for airport construction by State and local authorities is from bond issues, which in turn depend upon the taxing authority of the local governments. Many of these governments are extended to the limit of their resources. In most instances, these issues are general obligation bonds and the revenues derived from the airport are sufficient only to pay operating costs and debt service. In some situations, such as that of the city of Tulsa, bond issues have been authorized by the local voters in reliance upon continuing support and assistance from the Federal Government under the provisions of the Federal Airport Act.

Airports are not wholly local assets but are also national assets, serving as vital and necessary links in the interstate flow of goods and passengers, in our foreign trade, in the discharge of the Federal responsibility for the carriage of mail, and as active or standby facilities for military use. As stated to the committee by the Honorable Joseph E. Dillon, mayor of St. Paul, speaking on behalf of the U.S. Conference of Mayors:

"As mayors, we in the conference are well aware that the problem of airports is a national problem. I do not say this to shirk local responsibility. On the contrary, we accept the local responsibility and are here today to urge the Congress to accept the national responsibility. We support the continuing of the Federal-aid airport program on a 50–50 matching basis."

The necessity of an integrated system of adequate public airports for Federal purposes was succinctly stated as long ago as 1952 by General Doolittle in a special report to the President:

"No airport exists by itself, and the usefulness of each depends upon the quality of its neighbor. Fundamental to U.S. air transportation is a well-integrated system of airports which provide adequate facilities both at origination and destination points."

Use of airports by all types of traffic

The committee notes that there is an opinion expressed in some quarters that civil airports are maintained solely for the benefit of our commercial aviation fleet.

A recent official publication of the Civil Aeronautics Administration completely discredits such an erroneous notion. This report indicates that at the 196 civil airports in the United States at which CAA traffic control towers are located, the following record of aircraft operations (or airport use) is found:

	Number of operations	Percent of total operations
Commercial airlines	6,902,160	27.7
General aviation	12,748,541	51.2
Military	5,235,338	21.1
Total	24,886,039	100.0

Source: CAA publication Federal Airway Air Traffic Activity, Fiscal Year 1958.

While it is reasonable to assume that commercial aviation generates most of the passenger arrivals and departures at many airports, such is not necessarily true in every case.

Speaking for an organization representing approximately 75,000 private pilots, Mr. Cyril C. Thompson of the Aircraft Owners and Pilots Association submitted the following impressive testimony to the committee:

"The Government does not know today whether the general aviation aircraft fleet (private, business, and air taxi) exceeded the scheduled airline fleet in the number of people transported in the United States during the past year. The Department of Commerce did not undertake the gathering of statistics on this important subject when CAA was in that Department. The tabulation below is an estimate comparing airline and general aviation activity at six cities in the 100,000–200,000 population class. The estimate is based on a few sampling surveys. The figures tend to indicate that general aviation's traffic volume today may be the highest of any element in the Nation's air transportation picture."

Comparison of airline and general aviation activity at 6 cities in 100,000 to 200,000 population class

City or community	Population	Air carrier		General aviation
		Aircraft operations	Passengers in and out	Aircraft operations	People in and out (estimate)
El Paso, Tex	130,485	26,882	374,176	135,279	310,723
Grand Rapids, Mich	176,515	20,269	187,198	46,675	121,333
Sacramento, Calif	137,572	21,810	256,808	90,113	227,045
Mobile, Ala	129,009	27,020	170,894	59,886	128,164
South Bend, Ind	115,911	24,236	124,472	64,830	175,297
Peoria, Ill	111,856	15,681	91,710	38,743	101,154

(These figures show that general aviation aircraft operations far outnumber airline operations at each airport and that total people carried is substantial, sometimes exceeding the number of passengers carried in and out by the scheduled air carriers. The general aviation passenger figures are estimates based on sampling surveys. The Federal Government has never provided data from all airports covering an actual count of general aviation operations or people carried in and out. There is urgent need for official statistics.)

DEFENSE AND POSTAL CONSIDERATIONS

Airports cannot be considered solely as vital links in our commercial transportation system.

Airports occupy an important and intimate relationship to the exclusive Federal responsibility for the defense of the United States and the conduct and maintenance of our national postal system.

During World War II, 429 civil airports had been turned over to the Army and Navy by the end of the first quarter of 1945. According to testimony given the committee, a survey made as of June 30, 1957, indicated there were 237 civil airports that were being used jointly by civil and military aircraft. Thus, in addition to the emergency value of civil airports there is day-to-day utilization of them by components of our Military Establishment. In this regard, the committee was impressed by the fact that the Air Force Association during its 12th annual national convention, in September 1958 adopted the following resolution:

"FEDERAL AID TO AIRPORTS

"Whereas the Federal aid airport program expires June 30, 1959; and

"Whereas a continued program for the modernization and expansion of the civil airport system of this country is essential to keep pace with developments in the design and operation of aircraft, the increased volume of air traffic, and planned improvements in air navigation facilities and airways traffic control; and

"Whereas a long-range, well-planned airport development program, like the highway program, contributes both directly and indirectly to the communication and transportation facilities of the Nation, the economic and cultural welfare, and the national defense; and

"Whereas the Federal aid airport program as authorized by Congress benefits the Nation as a whole and is not limited to any particular community or State, or to any type or class of public airport, thereby benefiting all types of aircraft operators or users, and all citizens of the United States; and

"Whereas the optimum utility of all aircraft and the benefits all citizens of the United States derive from air transportation are directly dependent on the number of communities having adequate airport facilities: Therefore

"Resolved, That this association respectfully requests and urges the President and the Congress of the United States: (1) To enact legislation extending the Federal aid airport program to at least June 30, 1963, and (2) to authorize the expenditure of at least $100 million during each year of the program to efficiently and effectively carry forward this important development."

Moreover, it is important to observe that section 11(4) of the Federal Airport Act requires as a condition precedent that local sponsors guarantee in writing that "all the facilities of the airport developed with Federal aid and all those usable for the landing and takeoff of aircraft will be available to the United States for use by military and naval aircraft in common with other aircraft at all times without charge, except, if the use by military and naval aircraft shall be substantial, a reasonable share proportional to such use, of the cost of operating and maintaining the facilities so used (49 U.S.C. 1110(4))."

Our system of Federal airways has been called "postroads of the sky." Airways may be established only by the Federal Government. Complete authority and jurisdiction over them has been given to the Administrator of the Federal Aviation Agency, in whom is reposed plenary authority for the allocation of and use of our airspace. But these "postroads of the sky" must begin and end at an airport—an airport through which is being channeled a tremendously increasing volume of our mail.

The most outstanding example of the essentiality of airports to our postal service is found in the case of Alaska where almost all mail of every kind is transported by air. Moreover, the committee would call attention to the fact that the Postmaster General in a speech delivered to the United States Chamber of Commerce in Washington, D.C., on April 29, 1957, stated:

Basically, the Post Office can no longer rely, to the extent that it once could, on the railroads of the country for carrying the mails between post offices. Today there are only 2,600 mail carrying trains in contrast to more than 10,000 a quarter of a century ago. Today 70 percent of our post offices cannot be reached directly by train connections.

Consequently, the Post Office is increasingly depending upon airlines and trucks to speed the delivery of the mails.

Pertinent to both the Federal responsibility for our national defense and our postal system, is the fact that the civil agencies of the Federal Government which perform the function of air traffic control, weather reporting and air navigation assistance occupy quarters at local airports on a rent-free basis. These agencies are performing functions which are directly related not only to air commerce but also to our defense and postal needs. Again, section 11(5) of the Federal Airport Act specifically provides, as a condition precedent to the investment of even a dollar of Federal funds, that "the airport operator or owner will furnish to any civil agency of the Government without charge (except for light, heat, janitor service, and similar facilities and services at the reasonable cost thereof), such space in airport buildings as may be reasonably adequate for use in connection with any air traffic control activities, or weather-reporting activities and communications activities related to air traffic control, which such agency may deem it necessary to establish and maintain at the airport (49 U.S.C. 1110(5))."

In connection with this latter provision, the committee received information from the Federal Aviation Agency that at the present time the Federal Government is occupying rent free approximately 800,000 square feet of space in airport buildings at various public airports throughout the country.

Thus it is perfectly clear that the Federal matching dollar is neither wasted nor gratuitiously bestowed upon local airport operators, but rather represents part of a wise and needed Federal investment in assets which are of inestimable value to our Federal Government.

NEED FOR AN INCREASED LEVEL OF FEDERAL AID

Not only was the need for a continuation of Federal aid for airport development fully documented by the testimony in the hearings, but it is apparent that Federal aid must be provided at an increased level of funds.

During the course of the hearings, E. R. Quesada, Administrator of the Federal Aviation Agency, advised the committee that the FAA has just completed a comprehensive survey of the airport development required during the 4 calendar years beginning with the year 1959, in connection with its annual revision of the national airport plan. At the request of the committee a summary of this study was provided by the Agency in advance of publication of the revised national airport plan in order that it might be available during consideration of the pending bill relating to Federal aid to airports.

This represents the first such study by the Agency's airport experts to be available to the Congress. It shows an estimated cost of airport development required in this period of $1,290,458,000. The complete survey starts in the committee hearings at page 196. A summary of this survey showing the total amounts required, by States and by type of work, follows:

It should be noted that the total estimate of needs by the Federal Aviation Agency is in substantial conformity with a recent national airport survey conducted by the National Association of State and County Officials, the Airport Operators Council, and the American Association of Airport Executives. This survey discloses the following important information.

During the 4 fiscal years, July 1, 1958, to June 30, 1962, airport development projects are planned at 1,138 locations in the 49 States and the Territories and possessions at a total estimated cost of approximately $1,066 million. The survey discloses that funds available and anticipated from local and State sources will amount to approximately $589,666,000, leaving some $477 million in additional funds needed. According to officials who conducted the survey these figures are conservative because out of the 2,874 airports questioned, only 1,255, or 43 percent, responded. This survey is shown in the following table.

Last year the committee requested and received from the Civil Aeronautics Administration of the Department of Commerce certain statistical information on local sponsors' requests for Federal matching funds for fiscal year 1959 and the disposition of such requests by the Agency. Since the act was not extended last year no requests for fiscal year 1960 have been received by the Agency, and the information on the requests for fiscal year 1959 is therefore the most current now available by which to assess local estimates of airport needs. For fiscal year 1959, $192 million of Federal funds was requested for projects in the various States and Territories. After allocation of the available authorization of $63 million, a balance of $129 million of local requests remained unsatisfied.

National airport survey, 4-year period (July 1, 1958, to June 30, 1962) jointly conducted by National Association of State Aviation Officials, Airport Operators Council, American Association of Airport Executives

Availability of local matching funds

There can be no doubt that communities will make an effort, in view of pressing airport needs, to match with local funds an increased level of Federal aid to airports. The following table, which was furnished last year by the Civil Aeronautics Administration indicates that for the fiscal year 1959 local sponsors had earmarked some $293,404,000 for airport improvement.

NOTE.—As of Mar. 14, 1958.

Funds available under S. 1

It should be noted that even the increased amounts of Federal grants authorized in the bill would not provide, even over the 5-year period, 50 percent of the estimated airport development needs over a 4-year period.

A following comparative analysis, prepared by the committee, shows the total needs for each State and Territory, as estimated by the Federal Aviation Agency, and the amounts available under the bill.

The amounts available annually for each State under S. 1 are shown by the following table prepared by the Federal Aviation Agency:

SPECIAL DISCRETIONARY FUND

Section 3 of the bill authorizes the Administrator, in his discretion, to obligate $65 million, without reference to the State apportionment formula. This fund is in addition to the annual obligation authority provided in the bill and will remain available for use until expended.

The hearings conducted by the committee on this bill and on S. 3502 of the 85th Congress disclosed an immediate critical need, particularly in hub airports, for Federal assistance to provide facilities to handle the rapidly mounting volumes of air traffic, including the new jet aircraft which are already being introduced into our commercial airline fleets. The purpose of the fund is to assist in meeting that special need. It is for this reason that the bill permits the Administrator to utilize the fund without regard to the limitations of the State apportionment formula. As was stated by the committee last year:

"While it is expected that the introduction of jet service will be handled on a gradual phase-in process so that piston aircraft will remain the most usual type of plane for some years to come, nevertheless, the revolutionary changes in airline service resulting from the use of the jet aircraft will dramatically affect airport facilities throughout the country. These new jet aircraft are big, heavy, and fast, and will carry as many as 180 passengers at speeds averaging 550 miles per hour. Their weight, speed, and size require longer and stronger runways, wider taxiways, and numerous special facilities for servicing at ramps and terminal buildings on those airports where they will be in use. The length and type of runway at any particular airport will depend upon a number of factors, but primarily, the distance to the next point of destination and the takeoff weight of payload. Some important facts along this line were highlighted for the benefit of the committee during a symposium conducted on the operation of the jet plane in January 1958 and the document containing the report of this symposium, being issued as a committee print, is strongly recommended to the attention of all Members of the Senate. In addition to this informative résumé, the committee has noted the recent "Progress Report on Jet Aviation Planning" issued by the Department of Commerce which itemizes some of the more significant changes which must be accomplished in airport planning and operation for the proper accommodation of jet airliners. The report in full has been incorporated in the committee print on the jet symposium.

"In view of the committee, local communities cannot cope with the tremendous costs entailed by this revolutionary change in the mode of air transportation without the effective assistance of our National Government."

Additionally, the reequipment and modernization program of our local service and Territorial airlines which has been consistently encouraged by the Congress will have an immediate impact upon all of the smaller cities and towns in the United States which they serve. Their representative, Col. Joseph P. Adams, a former member of the Civil Aeronautics Board, emphasized to the committee that "the replacement of the DC-3 will in every case result in the use of larger aircraft requiring longer runways and more adequate airport facilities than are presently available in the majority of the smaller communities of the United States. To the extent that the new larger equipment will provide more efficient operations, the Federal subsidy to the air carriers will be reduced. This potential reduction is in the approximate amount of $40 million a year."

It is the intention of your committee that allocations from this special fund should not be subject to the present administratively imposed limitation of $1 million per year for any airport development project. A wise and equitable use of such fund will not only assist major hub airports to provide facilities to accommodate the larger jet planes but will also permit the conservation of the annual authorizaiton of $100 million for disposition to needed projects in the less populated areas of the United States where feeder airlines and general aviation aircraft constitute an important element of the local economy.

Reference to the statistical information furnished to the committee last year by the CAA and printed in the forepart of this report indicates that local funds are available to match the Federal dollars made available by the special emergency fund. Moreover, as we have noted, the official survey recently concluded by the FAA corroborates the need for a fund in the amount of the $65 million provided.

TERMINAL FACILITIES

Airports cannot serve our interstate and foreign commerce needs without adequate terminal facilities. The committee has consistently been of the opinion that terminal buildings, in order to accomplish this purpose, need only be functional and not monumental. The higher priority of need naturally is in ground facilities such as runways, lighting, clear zones, taxiways, etc., which bear a direct relationship to the safety of our interstate air traffic.

It is for this broad reason that section 5 of S. 1 spells out with particularity certain types of terminal facilities which would be ineligible for consideration for Federal matching funds. These include the cost of acquisition or construction of a passenger automobile parking facility, bars, cocktail lounges, nightclubs, theaters, private clubs, garages, hotel rooms, commercial offices, or gamerooms. In addition to these specifically proscribed facilities, the Administrator of the FAA is given the discretionary power to reject as an "allowable project cost" for the investment of Federal funds any other part of an airport terminal facility which he believes is not essential to the welfare and safety of those persons using the airport for public aviation purposes.

The administration bill, S. 674, would permit the use of Federal funds only for the construction of terminal facilities to be used to house air traffic control, weather reporting, and communications activities. Such quarters, as we have noted, are now occupied and will continue to be occupied rent free by the Federal agencies which are performing these functions.

It is the considered view of the majority of this committee that terminal buildings, as such, ought not to be declared ineligible for Federal matching funds, not only because of the universal recognition of the necessity for housing vital Federal functions at local public airports but also because of basic requirements of public health and safety which require the maintenance of appropriate facilities to accommodate our interstate and foreign traffic. These may be spartan or elaborate. In any event, the Administrator would be empowered to make the appropriate determination as to the eligibility of them for Federal assistance. If local communities desire to provide accommodations such as those specified in section 5 of S. 1, they will be entirely free to do so at their own expense. With reference to parking lots, the committee has observed a growing tendency to utilize these facilities for the production of airport revenue although we realize that at some small airports they are provided without charge. In any event, since it is perfectly possible for parking lots to be operated at a profit, there should be no necessity for recourse to the Federal Government for Federal assistance either in the acquisition of land for them or for their construction.

SEAL COATING

Section 6 of S. 1 includes the provision incorporated into last year's bill making runway seal coating and the filling of rigid pavement joints at smaller airports eligible for Federal matching assistance. The need for this type of assistance was outlined as follows in the committee's report on S. 3502:

"During recent years the Civil Aeronautics Agency has regarded seal coating of flexible airport pavements and the filling of joints in rigid airport pavements as 'maintenance' as distinguished from 'development' and hence an item to be wholly financed by the local operator. This has led to a number of hardships in the case of public airports operating under local sponsorship which do not have sufficient operating income to keep runways in proper condition without assistance from the Federal Government. While resealing and refilling of joints are items of repair work which may be more costly than other types of maintenance work normally required for airports, it is not an item for which frequent and regular provision is generally necessary. Unless runways are resurfaced periodically, deterioration may result to such an extent that reconstruction becomes necessary. Many small communities are required to maintain airports with runways of substantial length so as to accommodate the type of aircraft used in the airport and the cost of seal coating of airport pavements and the filling of joints would require an expenditure of sums in excess of the financial capability of the community. The cost of providing matching funds to encourage the maintenance of such airports would be a relatively small item in the overall Federal airport program and would serve to keep in operating condition a number of airport facilities constituting a valuable adjunct to our national system of airports."

Testimony at the present hearings indicates that this provision for seal coating is more than ever required if we are to preserve our national investment in the fields to which it would apply. As in last year's bill, S. 3502, only airports at which air traffic is not sufficient to justify an FAA control tower would be eligible for such assistance.

ADVANCE PUBLICATION OF ANNUAL AIRPORT PROGRAM

The present bill also incorporates the requirement that the Agency shall publish by January 1 of each year the proposed program of airport development intended to be undertaken during the following fiscal year. As noted in the committee's report on S. 3502, this advance publication, by giving reasonable notice of the amount of Federal funds on which they may rely, will be of great aid to project sponsors whose planning requirements are stringent even after allocations are made.

In this connection, as another aid to more efficient planning, the committee again wishes to note the extreme desirability of making tentative advance allocations to specific projects wherever possible.

The act was amended in 1955 to provide that annual amounts of $60 million would be allocated for projects in the continental United States and $3 million for projects in the Territories and possessions. The original requirement as to the apportionment of 75 percent of the funds among the States on an area and population basis was left undisturbed.

The chief purpose of the 1955 amendment was to enable local communities to prepare long-range plans for airport construction with some assurance that the local funds, chiefly obtained by bond issuance, would be matched by available Federal funds.

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce which recommended the 1955 amendment for favorable consideration, specifically expressed the view that the act, as revised, would "permit the Department of Commerce to program projects in advance of the fiscal year during which the authorized funds are to be available for obligation. In other words, it would be possible a year or two before a proposed project is to be undertaken to make an allocation of Federal funds for that project in a specified amount which would eliminate any question as to the availability of Federal funds for the project" (S. Rept. No. 636, 84th Cong., 1st sess., p. 7).

The committee stated that it was influenced in making such recommendation by the record of successful administration of the Federal highway program which had long been operating on a contract authority basis similar to that which it intended for the Federal aid airport program. During the course of both the present hearings and those of the 84th Congress, the committee was advised that advance allocations of specific funds for future project work had not been made except in isolated instances. In this respect, the record of the Federal airport program is disappointing.

The committee recognizes that the provisions of section 5 of the Federal Airport Act do not permit the obligation, by a grant agreement, of any part of funds authorized for a particular fiscal year until July 1 of such fiscal year. However, existing law permits the Secretary to make tentative advance allocations in proper cases so as to carry out the intent of the 1955 amendment. Thus, funds can be earmarked for worthwhile projects in advance of the fiscal year when they are authorized to be obligated. A greater employment of such policy would contribute to the stability of the program by lending needed assurance of continued Federal aid for the completion of major airport projects, which cannot be accomplished in 1 fiscal year. The committee wishes to state, however, that it does not recommend that all future funds be allocated in advance but rather that sufficient funds be retained to meet all reasonably anticipated contingencies.

SPECIAL COMMENTS

Encouraging regional airports

The committee has noted with satisfaction various examples of airport development on an intercounty or regional basis whereby one field is used to serve the aviation needs of several communities. As examples of such cooperative planning, Mr. Coffee of the National Association of County Officials cited the Mercer County (N.J.) Airport which serves 13 municipalities, and the nearby Allentown-Bethlehem-Easton Airport in Pennsylvania.

It should be more than obvious that regional airport requirements can most often be met more efficiently and economically through one large, modern field than by having 3 or 4 or 10 smaller, rundown terminals serving separate municipalities, each with a relatively small tax base upon which to rely. In many instances, this combining of resources has made it possible for small communities to obtain local feeder-transport service where, separately, they would have been completely unable to support a field which would accommodate passenger transport aircraft. We believe that more should be done to encourage such cooperative efforts, and that the Agency should take positive action toward stimulating local officials to adopt this type of forward-looking planning. For example, Agency representatives might be sent to address local civic and business groups on the desirability of regional airport planning and to assist, when appropriate, in the development of such plans.

Tailoring aircraft designed to existing airport facilities

The jet-age revolution in aircraft design and characteristics has brought with it the now vital problem of assuring that airport facilities and aircraft requirements are kept realistically in balance. Mr. Edward P. Curtis, former aviation assistant to the President, summed up the problem well in January 1957 when he stated:

"There has been a decided tendency in the past to design and build maximum performance aircraft on the assumption that somehow airports will be built to accommodate them. Instead of demanding more and more concrete the designers must make maximum use of the technique like boundary layer and jet-flap control to improve the takeoff and landing characteristics of our future airplanes."

The committee agrees that with the spiraling cost of lengthening runways and obtaining the extra land and clear zones required, it is time that aircraft be designed to fit the airport system and not vice versa. We strongly urge the Federal Aviation Agency to step up its efforts with aircraft manufacturers as well as their customers—including the military—to achieve this objective. If necessary this should be done by using the Agency's power, under section 603 of the Federal Aviation Act, to refuse certification to aircraft types which will clearly require runway and other facilities substantially greater than those in existence or being planned.

Moreover, during the course of hearings and study, many members of the committee properly observed that costly airport expenditures required to accommodate ground facilities to changing aircraft designs cannot be carried on with Federal assistance ad infinitum. If aircraft designs now on the drawing boards of the aircraft industry require the abandonment of metropolitan sites, or expansion of airport facilities beyond the bounds of reason, then it is the view of many members that such expenses would have to be financed by the local communities, the carriers using the equipment, or the aircraft industry itself.

COMMITTEE AMENDMENTS

Reduction of special discretionary fund

On page 3, line 19, strike "$75,000,000" and substitute in lieu thereof "$65,000,000."

The committee has made a reduction of $10 million in the amount of special discretionary funds which the bill would make available to the Administrator. Representatives of the Federal Aviation Agency informed the committee that $10 or $11 million in uncommitted funds will remain at the end of the current fiscal year from obligation authority under the present act. Although some of this money is now earmarked for use in the various States, none of it has been programed for specific projects and is therefore available for use in meeting the estimated $1,290 million of future airport needs contained in the Agency survey discussed above. In view of this carryover we believe it is reasonable to deduct an equal amount from the $75 million special discretionary fund originally proposed in S. 1.

Immediate availability of discretionary fund

On page 3, line 19, strike out the phrase "beginning July 1, 1959," and insert in lieu thereof "upon the date of enactment of this subsection."

The purpose of this amendment is to allow the Administrator to make immediate use of the $65 million special discretionary fund. As stated above, this fund has been included primarily to meet the critical need for providing jet-age facilities at larger airports. For this reason the committee believes that the availability of such moneys should not be delayed any longer than necessary. This view finds support in the administration's bill, S. 674, which also provides for the immediate availability of discretionary funds.

Redistribution of funds

Four new sections have been added to S. 1 by the committee. The first of these, section 8, would amend section 6(c) of the act by requiring that any funds allocated to a State which remain unobligated at the end of 2 fiscal years shall be added to the Administrator's discretionary fund.

Under current law, such unobligated moneys are subject to redistribution at the end of 2 fiscal years according to the initial allocation formula, i.e., 75 percent is divided among the States with 25 percent going into the discretionary fund, and the same redistribution is made at the end of each succeeding fiscal year. The practical result of this procedure has been to keep substantial amounts of money indefinitely bottled up in allocations to States whose actual use of Federal funds remains at a consistently lower level.

The committee amendment would assure a more judicious and efficient use of airport aid money by allowing all State-allocated funds which remain unused after 2 years to be employed wherever most needed. Such a change in allocation procedure is also recommended by the administration and a provision to the same effect as this amendment is contained in the administration-sponsored bill.

Interstate compacts

The second new section, section 9, has been added to facilitate interstate airport development planning. Article I, section 10, part 3, of the Constitution requires that all compacts between the various States receive the consent of Congress. Section 9, adding a new section 21 to the act, would operate to give advance consent to any State plan for developing or operating airport facilities thus obviating the delay and uncertainty involved in seeking separate approval for each such pact. Precedents for this type of advanced authorization exist in the case of Interstate Forest and Water Supply Agreements (16 U.S.C. 552), in the field of crime prevention (4 U.S.C. 111), and for highway safety pacts (Public Law 85-684).

Treatment of Alaska

The intent of the present bill is that Alaska should continue to participate in the Federal airport program in the same manner as it has in the past, by receiving a specific percentage of the separate funds made available for noncontiguous areas under section 5(b) of the act and with a maximum Federal contribution of 75 percent. Sections 10 and 11 of the bill make technical amendments to more clearly express this intent. In addition, the committee deletes those parts of section 2 of the bill (redrafting sec. 5(b) of the act) in which the same purpose was originally sought to be accomplished in another manner.

Continuation of the present formula was recommended to the committee by both Senators from Alaska. While it results in a smaller total allocation of Federal funds than would be available under the State allocation formula, it insures the maximum airport development with the very limited amount of funds which Alaska will have available for such purposes during the period covered by this bill.

The continuation of a program of special treatment for Alaska is justified by consideration of the uniquely vital role which aviation plays in that State. Practically speaking, aviation is the only means of passenger transport to and from Alaska and within the State—except for the Anchorage-Fairbanks railroad line and a highway system still in its infancy—it is the only form of transport. Furthermore, from a military standpoint, it is of obvious importance that we make a maximum effort toward maintaining and improving landing fields, civil as well as military, in this area closest to the Soviet Union. The importance of aviation to the postal needs of Alaska has already been noted and, as a final justification for the philosophy of higher Federal participation in Alaskan airport development, it is to be remembered that over 99 percent of land ownership in that State is in the Federal Government.

Technical amendment

On page 5, line 2, a typographical error is corrected by reversing the order of the period and quotation mark.

INDIVIDUAL VIEWS OF SENATOR ENGLE

I wish to emphasize my complete disagreement with the ultimate objective of the administration's bill, S. 674, which would provide for the eventual withdrawal from the Federal aid-to-airport program within the next few years. This would be done through the device of a declining authorization program and eventually its complete abandonment.

Both the President and his official spokesman, General Quesada, have made it plain that it is the official policy of the administration to leave this responsibility completely to the States, counties, and cities. In support of this policy it has been stated that civil airports should be regarded as primarily a wholly local asset.

In my opinion, an adequate national system of civil airports is as much a Federal responsibility as a national highway system for which we have provided many billions of dollars, much of it on a 90–10 matching basis.

The Federal Government should no more abandon the Federal aid-to-airport program than it should abandon the Federal road program or Federal assistance in the maritime transportation field. In my view, airports are an essential part of the national transportation system, just as much as the highways and the waterways. Moreover, the maintenance of an adequate system of airports will grow more important rather than less important as time goes on. If Congress must make a choice between cutting back on Federal assistance to any element of our national transportation system—which I do not advocate at all—I would rank airports as the last element to be reduced or eliminated. I cannot subscribe to the philosophy contained in the administration's bill, S. 674, that the Federal Government, at the end of its proposed reduced program should pull out and leave the airports of the country as an undue burden upon State and local communities.

Mr. BIBLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I am very happy to yield to my distinguished colleague. All of us regret very deeply that he has chosen to become a member of the Committee on Appropriations. I may say that the Appropriations Committee's gain certainly is the Aviation Subcommittee's loss.

Mr. BIBLE. I thank the Senator for his kind sentiments. It is with deep regret that I leave the Aviation Subcommittee.

We are in the habit of conferring political titles. I believe he wears his title in very good fashion. He wears the title of "Mr. Aviation" very gracefully and very deservedly.

Mr. MONRONEY. Not deservedly, but I appreciate the Senator's great compliment.

Mr. BIBLE. I should like to ask the Senator a question concerning a point I do not believe the Senator has touched in his statement. It seems to me that it is of great importance, because this problem largely goes to the extent of the amount of money involved in the bill. Is it not correct to say that a survey has been made as to the airport development needs in this country over a period of 4 or 5 years?

Mr. MONRONEY. Yes. When General Quesada, the Federal Aviation Administrator, testified in recommending the administration program, the withdrawal program—$65 million the first year, $55 million the second, $45 million the third, and $35 million the fourth, with a 50-percent discretionary fund and a 50-percent State fund—we asked the general on what basis he had arrived at these magic figures. He said they were based on the Federal Aviation Agency's own survey. Naturally, we wanted to see the figures.

We had before us the survey of the Airport Operators Council, the American Municipal League, and others, and we had arrived at a figure of about $1,026 million, if my memory serves me correctly, as the total amount required for airport development in this country during the next 5 years. We asked General Quesada what his figures showed, because we were ready to adjust the bill with any survey that his Agency had made. We presumed his survey would be much lower, because the figure of proposed authorizations offered by the administration was much lower. Therefore, we asked him to supply the figures to us. We asked him when we could have the figures. He said that he would be able to supply them by March 1. We told him that we hoped to pass the bill before March 1. We said that if he had the figures we were entitled to have them, too. We said we did not care for the writeup; we just wanted the bare bones of the statistics.

We were considerably surprised when the figures were furnished. They showed that the airport requirements for the next 4 calendar years were $1,290,458,000. That was the Agency's figure. That is practically $1,300 million.

Mr. BIBLE. I understand this survey was made by the present administration. Is that correct?

Mr. MONRONEY. The figures were furnished by General Quesada, the head of the Federal Aviation Administration. It was made on the basis of a careful survey of what the requirements were to bring our airports up to present-day standards.

Mr. BIBLE. I assume the estimate is a little in excess of $300 million a year for 4 years.

Mr. MONRONEY. That is correct.

Mr. BIBLE. I wonder whether there are not other measuring sticks which can be used as to the need involved. It occurs to me it might be interesting to know what the requests from the various airport sponsors were in fiscal 1958 or fiscal 1959. Perhaps the Senator has already touched on that point.

Mr. MONRONEY. The Senator will find that the figures furnished last year by CAA—which is now the FAA—show that the city and county and municipal authorities requested a total of $192,268,000 last year. That amount they were ready to match at 50 percent in matching funds. They were asking for a matching allocation of $192 million. Under the present act only $63 million could be allocated. That leaves $129 million in unsatisfied and unmatched requests for this year alone.

If we multiply that figure by 5, we get $1 billion in prospective construction for the next 5 years. This is another test, and these are not our figures, it must be remembered. They are taken right from the record of the committee. That was almost a year ago, when S. 3052, the predecessor of S. 1, was passed without a dissenting vote in the Senate.

We can see, therefore, that the $63 million left unfilled the requests of the cities, ready and willing and able to match funds of $129 million. Therefore, the President's approach of $65 million, $55 million, $45 million, $35 million, and then nothing is like sending a baby to do a man's job in the construction field.

Mr. BIBLE. I thank the Senator from Oklahoma. It occurs to me that whichever measuring stick we use, the amount in the bill is, if anything, inadequate.

Mr. MONRONEY. It is quite inadequate.

Mr. BIBLE. It seems to be inadequate to take care of the air age in which we live.

Mr. MONRONEY. It is inadequate, but it is far more realistic in connection with our attempt to meet the airport needs we have than any other proposal that has been made. Certainly it is more realistic than the administration's withdrawal program of 65 down to 35, or the proposal which the Republicans will offer later, to continue the 4-year-old airport program for another 4 years. A great many things have happened in the past 4 years to show that airport construction needs are continually increasing and do not remain fixed. The administration program is wholly inadequate.

Perhaps we cannot provide for the erection of some of the facilities it might be well to have constructed, but at least we can get the essentials crowded into the funds we do provide in the bill which, as amended today, will authorize $465 million to meet the needs shown in the Federal Aviation Agency's own survey, which shows that there will be a $1,300 million requirement.

Mr. BIBLE. Does the Senator from Oklahoma have any reason to believe that the administration's own Agency would come up with a figure which is grossly in error or inadequate?

Mr. MONRONEY. We cannot relate the administration's figures to anything. Their figures—which we had not seen—relate more to our bill than they relate to their own bill. If we are to appropriate money, we must relate the appropriation to something. Our figures, as the Senator has so ably brought out, relate, first, to the Federal Aviation Agency's own survey and, second, to the survey conducted by the Airport Operators Council and municipal authorities.

I do not know what better triangularization we can have to find out where we are than to take these three bearings, which are all important and meet the sum as best we can.

Mr. BIBLE. Is it not reasonable to assume that if the administration, through its own Agency, has a survey made and decides upon a figure of $1,300 million for 4 years, that figure should be essentially the figure which is carried in the aviation bill?

Mr. MONRONEY. We have tried to do that as nearly as we were able. It is a presumption. It is give and take. It may not be necessary to build some of the facilities in the next 3 or 4 years. It might be possible to postpone some of the work. That was why we cut out $100 million from the bill for the fifth year. It was done at the request of the leadership, and in the hope of avoiding a veto. We can reserve that sum, and at the end of 3½ years, if the need still exists, be it more or less, we can come before the Senate with another airport program to meet the needs which a survey at that time will show.

The present FAA survey covers 4 years, and the bill runs for 4 years.

Mr. BIBLE. It is certainly true that S. 1 comes closer to meeting the needs indicated in the administration's survey than does the proposal in the minority views.

Mr. MONRONEY. Indeed it does. Furthermore, by taking a realistic approach to this matter, the small airports of the country will be benefited. They have never been a chief concern of the aviation agencies. They have always been considered as the low man on the totem pole. Now they will have the opportunity to join up and be included in the bill.

A vast amount of work is required to be done to lengthen runways at the hub airports. It can be done only at a cost of $1,000 a foot. That is the cost of constructing a present-day runway. Every time a runway is lengthened 1 foot, the cost is $1,000. If we do not provide funds in the bill for this work, 5 more years will pass, and the small communities which could acquire air transportation or air taxi service will not have the opportunity to benefit from these developments. The same is true of the flying farmers. We must also consider the growth of general aviation, including the use of business planes by traveling men to cover their territories.

This is the field which S. 1 will cover with the amounts provided in it. But under the administration bill, and under the suggestions made by the Republicans in the committee, the program would not be expanded, and the money allotted would not be sufficient to provide for these needs.

Mr. BIBLE. I thank the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. MONRONEY. I thank the Senator from Nevada for his very excellent comments.

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I am glad to yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. ENGLE. The Senator has very clearly indicated that the figures used in the bill are realistic in the light of the needs. We shall perhaps be told in the debate on the bill that we should not have a bill which includes the amount of money called for, because it will unbalance the President's budget; in other words, whatever the need—and conceding that the figures are correct—the priority of balancing the budget is higher than the priority of building airports. That is basically the question we shall have to decide. The question is whether the amount called for will put the budget out of balance to some extent.

I ask the Senator from Oklahoma to comment on that very point, with reference to the priority and the importance of the airport program as related to the question whether the budget ought to be kept in balance.

Mr. MONRONEY. In the first place, the President's proposal for the coming fiscal year was for an authorization of $65 million. Our proposal for the fiscal year is $100 million. So we would be authorizing contracts at a level of $35 million more than the President has suggested.

If we reduce that to outgo during the next year, probably we shall never be able to tell the difference, because we have been operating on a $63 million year allocation. The new work which would be supported under S. 1 still has to be planned. The new projects must be designed. They must be actually built before any money will go out of the Treasury. My guess is that there would probably be no difference in total outgo from the Treasury during this coming fiscal year under our bill, under the President's bill, or under the proposal of the Republican members of the committee, who will propose $63 million a year and a 4-year program, making our program cost $37 million more than theirs.

Eventually, the amount we propose will increase Treasury expenditures, because contract obligation authority is what we are granting. This will eventually be met by later appropriations.

So over the next 5 or 6 years we will average, for sure, some $35 million a year more than what would be spent under the President's program or under the program proposed by the Republican members of the committee. We have proposed a $65 million discretionary fund. Whether all of it is used or not will be up to the President's own representative who runs the Aviation Agency. If he does not find the need for it, he does not have to spend a nickel of it. So if he wants to spread $65 million, in special discretionary funds, over the 4 years, he can do so. If he wishes, he can spend at the rate of $16 million a year to meet emergency needs.

But what Congress is providing, and which will go mostly into State allocation, is an increase of at least $35 million a year over the other programs. That is not going to break the United States. If aviation is a vital means of transportation, I say to my distinguished colleague from Alaska—and it is the only transportation he has in Alaska, and it is becoming more important to every other State—if this is a vital means of transportation in our world, an amount equal to only 1½ percent of what we are spending on the interstate highway system on a 90-percent Federal–10-percent State grant, is not out of line. I think we cannot starve this means of transportation. Anything less than what is provided in the bill would result in starvation, instead of an opportunity for the municipalities and States to build their facilities.

Mr. ENGLE. It boils down, does it not, to the question of the kind of priority which should be given this program; that is, whether over the long haul this program is so important as to warrant $35 million in extra money.

Is it not true that somewhere in the budget is a request for three fine plush jet transport airplanes for VIP use?

Mr. MONRONEY. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ENGLE. Does the Senator know what those planes will cost?

Mr. MONRONEY. Yes; they will cost in the neighborhood of $5 million apiece, or a total of approximately $15 million. There are also 10 more jets—major jets—plus about 33 minor jets, which have a strange configuration as they have been adapted to the use of major generals or officers of higher rank, all totaling $77 million. They are the rather plush type of noncritical or noncombat aircraft. They were included in this year's budget.

So if we can spend $77 million for VIP planes in addition to three for the President, Secretary Dulles, and whoever else the other one is for—one is in reserve, I suppose, in case someone else wants to go somewhere in a hurry—I think we can then afford to spend the amount we are seeking in this bill, because each of the special VIP jet planes will cost about $5 million, or a total of $15 million, together with the $77 million which I have spoken about.

This amount would pay over 3 or 4 years for the additional regular costs which we recommend in the bill.

I think it is necessary to put these matters in perspective. We do not have to buy every turkey which the administration wants us to buy, whether it be for defense or anything else.

As an example, work is under way to build a costly airport for Washington. It will be built at Chantilly. I am for it. It is necessary to have a second airport for Washington, just as many other metropolitan cities are finding it necessary to have second airports. The airport at Chantilly will cost $75 million or $80 million. But the District of Columbia will not contribute one nickel toward its construction; it will be built completely with Federal money.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I am delighted to yield to the Senator from Alaska, who has done so much to point up the bill and show the need for it, not only as it affects his home State but also the other States similarly situated.

Mr. BARTLETT. I am wondering what the responsibility of the Administrator of the Federal Aviation Agency is with respect to the allocation of funds. My question goes to the proposition of terminal facilities, which I happen to believe are a very essential part of any airport development program.

Let us assume a municipality, as a part of a plan, gives cost estimates for a terminal building which the Administrator thinks is too elaborate and is twice as costly, let us say, as the one which the Agency had planned. Does he have to accept the municipality's estimates as a part of the whole plan or can he send the plan back for reexamination and resubmission?

Mr. MONRONEY. On page 4 of the bill, line 8, is the provision "costs not allowed." That provision specifically rules out "the cost of construction of those parts of passenger or freight terminal buildings and other airport administrative buildings intended for use as bars, cocktail lounges, night clubs, theaters, private clubs, garages, hotel rooms, commercial offices, or gamerooms or such other use which, in the opinion of the Administrator"—this is the language of President Eisenhower's representative; it is not ours—is not essential to the welfare and safety of those persons using airports for public aviation purposes.

I do not know how one could be more specific about the matter. As a matter of fact, when the plans come to him, all he will have to do will be to blue-pencil any items which he does not think are essential to the use of the traveling public.

Mr. BARTLETT. He has absolute authority, does he not?

Mr. MONRONEY. Yes; he does. In fact, he has so much authority and control that sometimes I am afraid he might go overboard and might unduly enlarge baggage facilities, waiting room space, and so forth.

Certainly this measure is drawn so tightly that I do not know how we could be more specific in stating to a Federal administrator that no frills are to be allowed support with Federal matching money. Of course, the airports can build movie theaters or other facilities of a frill nature, but they cannot do so with Federal funds.

Mr. BARTLETT. The bill specifically precludes the use of Federal funds for such purposes, does it not?

Mr. MONRONEY. Yes. In fact, in the bill we have stated certain examples of items to be excluded; and then we say generally "or such other facilities as are not essential."

Mr. BARTLETT. Let me ask the Senator from Oklahoma whether the figures which appear on page 22 of the report—I refer to the figures in regard to the need and availability of funds under Senate bill 1—are the best judgment of the Federal Aviation Agency as to the actual needs of the several States?

Mr. MONRONEY. Yes. I must say that Senate bill 1 as reported provides for a 5-year program, and the listing in the bill is based on that 5-year program. The amount of new authorizations under this bill will be $100 million less than the authorizations which were made in last year's bill. So it will be necessary to make a reduction of 20 percent in those figures.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a revision of the table appearing on page 22 of the report, so as to show the total amounts available under Senate bill 1, after adoption of the committee amendment reducing the extension of the program to 4 years and reducing the total obligation authority to $465 million.

There being no objection, the revision of the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. BARTLETT. Even so, Mr. President, I would ask the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma whether there is not a wide gap between the availability of funds under Senate bill 1, as reported, and the actual needs. For example, I note that California has needs almost nine times as great as those which would be satisfied by Senate bill 1—the total need there being $200 million.

Mr. MONRONEY. That is correct; California has needs which the Federal Government is not expected to match.

The Senator from Alaska heard the testimony of representatives of the Los Angeles Airport, which has spent approximately 70 percent of its own money in new construction; and he heard similar testimony. But under this program the allocations to California are to be made directly on the formula basis.

Under the discretionary provisions, if there are needs which must be met and cannot be met with State-allocated funds, the Administrator has authority, as well, to use money from the discretionary funds.

Mr. BARTLETT. In any case, is it not true that even if all the money authorized under Senate bill 1 were appropriated and spent, the needs would not be met, because this program is expanding so rapidly?

Mr. MONRONEY. That is entirely correct. We have trimmed this program all we could, but still we shall have to have annual contract obligation authority of approximately $35 million per year more than the amounts the President requested.

I believe sincerely, from the bottom of my heart, that we can eliminate the fat, the waste, and so forth, from the budget far better by reducing authorizations and funds for items of an expandable nature, rather than by reducing authorization and funds for the very long range capital investment program which is required for our Federal airport system.

I like to think of the matter from the standpoint that every dollar the Federal Government provides will be matched equally by the States or the cities. This program is one of the best, because it will be of national benefit; and the cities will join the Federal Government in the program. Furthermore, all programs relating directly to interstate commerce or communications or foreign transportation have always been dealt with on a 50–50 matching basis; and we believe that, on that basis, this program is "a whale of a good buy."

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma for his clear exposition; and I believe the Nation should be grateful to him for his contribution in this most vital field.

Mr. MONRONEY. I thank the Senator from Alaska.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CANNON in the chair). Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. DODD. I have a question which arises from section 5 of the bill, concerning which the Senator from Alaska has just now made inquiry. It is comforting to everyone, I believe, to know that bars, cocktail lounges, theaters, and so forth, are not eligible for construction, under this measure. However, I notice that in section 5 of the bill there is language which refers to passenger or freight terminal buildings and other airport administrative buildings.

Mr. MONRONEY. Yes.

Mr. DODD. That is confusing to me, and I think it might be confusing to those who will administer the act. I wonder whether it might better be clarified, at least with respect to the legislative intent, if not by an actual legislative amendment. As I understand, one aspect of this great growth is in the area of air freight.

Mr. MONRONEY. Yes.

Mr. DODD. I expect that considerable demand will be made for the construction of air freight handling facilities. It seems to me reasonable to assume that if there is such growth in the air transportation industry, private capital will be available for the purpose of setting up such facilities—in other words, to build the buildings, and perhaps to operate them. I wonder whether it might be better to spell out—as I have said, either by expressing our legislative intent or by means of a carefully drawn amendment—that before the Administrator of these funds makes a grant, he should have from the State or municipal or county authority a certification that no private risk capital is available for this purpose.

Mr. MONRONEY. He could write his own regulations to that effect and still be perfectly within the borders of the bill. I would say to my distinguished colleague that if the municipalities, who today are pressed so greatly by the demands for schools, roads, and sewer systems, could find anyone who would save them the 50 percent matching money which this bill requires, or more, they would be happy to proceed in that way, rather than to use their own funds.

Mr. DODD. I think the Senator from Oklahoma is correct about that. But I believe both of us recognize that some people who get into public office are inclined to extend their own bureaucratic empires—I have had that experience, and I am sure the Senator from Oklahoma has had it—some of these people are reluctant to turn over to private venture things of this kind.

So this would seem to be a perfect place for us to apply the private-enterprise doctrine about which we speak so often—particularly in the case of the air-freight terminals. In the years which lie ahead, and as a result of the growth of this great industry, facilities of other types will be required. So I believe it would be well for us to provide that wherever any local, State, or county authority can obtain private capital with which to do this job, it must use private capital instead of Federal funds.

Mr. MONRONEY. That is done now. For example, at Idlewild Airport, practically no Federal funds are being used for terminal buildings; the terminals are being built completely by the overseas airlines. I believe it will be found that most of the large terminal buildings at the Pittsburgh Airport were built by private funds, or at least were rented by private industry. Certainly most of the city funds have to be obtained by bond issues; and, in that connection, the public has to know what it is voting on.

Mr. DODD. Yes.

Mr. MONRONEY. And I should say that such a bond issue would be in severe jeopardy if the city officials tried to do, at city expense, something which could be done without the cost of $1 to the taxpayers.

I believe the history of the legislation will show that, because of a shortage of funds, the terminal buildings and other such facilities at an airport are usually the last thing that the Aviation Administrator, and usually the airport, get around to building. Today, in a number of places—St. Louis, for example—it will be found that all the freight facilities are privately owned. The same is true of other places.

Mr. DODD. Would it do violence to the bill or would the Senator find it burdensome if a simple amendment were drafted requiring the Federal Aviation Administrator to receive a certification to the effect that private funds are not available before he can approve an application for the allocation of Federal funds for the construction of a freight terminal or other such facilities?

Mr. MONRONEY. I should like to study such an amendment. The program has been working well. I do not think any freight terminal buildings have been constructed in the years in which Federal grants have been allowed. I think some have been built by private industry. We get involved with the requirement that certain land would have to be condemned near an airport or adjacent to it. The question would arise whether land could be condemned for that purpose. Some legal problems might arise.

Mr. DODD. It would not seem to me to raise that question. Let us assume a set of facts. Let us assume that in Baltimore it is found prudent and necessary to have a freight terminal constructed on the present airport grounds.

The proper agency in Baltimore or Maryland applies to the Federal Aviation Administrator, let us say, for $5,000 to put up such a building. All I am suggesting is that before the application can be approved, it must be certified to the Federal Aviation Administrator that no private risk capital is available for putting up that structure.

Mr. MONRONEY. Offhand, I see no objection to such a provision; but certainly, before I say I would accept the amendment, I should like to ascertain the contingencies which may be involved. What actually happens in practice is that a hand-me-down terminal usually becomes a freight terminal, or that a hangar which the Military Establishment has given up becomes a freight terminal.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Why should not the airlines build their own warehouses?

Mr. DODD. That is what I am thinking about, of course.

Mr. MONRONEY. It has not been done so far. However, if six airlines are serving one city and each airline carries cargo, I certainly would like to see, not six terminals built for freight on a crowded airport, but one good one.

Mr. DODD. I think that could be worked out, but the trucking industry provides its own freight-handling facilities. The rails do. Why should the taxpayers be called upon to put facilities up for freight handlers in the airline industry?

Apropos of the requirement of a certification, this is what we have done with respect to small business loans and other types of Federal financing where loans or grants have been made. It is required that a certification such as I have suggested in this instance be made to the proper and competent Federal authority. I think it would tighten up the law, if the Senator will permit me to say so. It may be I am seeing things that do not exist or will not come into being, but why take a chance? Why not be sure? Why not write and accept a simple amendment to see that it does not happen?

Mr. MONRONEY. Would the Senator be good enough to draft and put the amendment in writing, so we can ascertain whether there is any way in which it might interfere with carrying out the program? I wish, just as the Senator from Connecticut does, to conserve every nickel of Federal funds where any work can be financed by private industry. In fact, we glory in the terminal buildings which have been constructed with private funds. The Agency is glad to relieve itself not only of the capital investment required, but of the maintenance and care of those facilities.

Mr. President, my colleague from West Virginia has been waiting for quite a while. He has a contribution to make. I should like to yield to the Senator from West Virginia, who is an aviation authority, and who has been interested in aviation matters all his life.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, my colleague from Oklahoma is very gracious. I am not an expert. I would want to be classified as a student. The development of air transportation is in the process of transition, as are, in fact, all media of transportation. It is a stimulating subject.

The approach made by the subcommittee, of which the Senator from Oklahoma is chairman, is one of encouragement in this vitally important challenge to our courage and vision. I call attention to the inquiry and the observation which was made by the esteemed Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. COTTON]. He indicated in reference to certain moneys there perhaps was a departure in this proposal respecting discretionary funds. Was that the opinion which the Senator from Oklahoma gathered from the remarks by the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. MONRONEY. There was an indication that the proposal provided more in the way of discretionary funds as a result of the blanket $65 million to be made available over the 4-year period. Such a provision has never been carried in the bill before, but the need for discretionary funds was clearly pointed out by the Federal Aviation Administrator, who asked that 50 percent of the funds available under the regular program be made discretionary.

Mr. RANDOLPH. It is important for us to realize that we are in this period of transition, I repeat, and certain amounts of money are necessary to be used in a discretionary manner. I commend the chairman of the Subcommittee on Aviation and all the members of it, including those individuals who present a positive approach to this problem. There is the fact of change. In that connection, I should like to thank the Senator from Oklahoma and the members of his subcommittee who gave me the opportunity of testifying for approximately 1 hour and 30 minutes on January 23 on this legislation.

Mr. MONRONEY. May I say to the distinguished Senator that his testimony was most helpful, and revealed a vast wealth of information, and was certainly considered to be one of the highlights of the hearings.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I thank the Senator. There should be no desire to detain the Senate, because I believe Senators are ready to vote on this proposal. I believe it is a measure which is thoroughly understood by Senators.

During the testimony which I was privileged to give before the Senator from Oklahoma and my colleagues on the subcommittee I said:

> I have indicated that I believe that the program of the administration—

That is the Federal administration—

> at the present time fails to meet fully the needs which I feel are apparent.

Then, in further reference to S. 1, I made this further comment:

> I only repeat that I believe that the approach is inadequate, and that Senate bill 1 more nearly meets the immediate needs in this matter.

So I join in the colloquy today with those who have indicated that there is an inadequacy of funds presented in Senate bill 1; but I also believe it would be the part of good judgment for this body to pass the measure essentially as it is presented in the Senate today—in the hope that the bill may become law.

I have kept in mind, of course, the modifications which have been made by the Senator from Oklahoma and by his colleagues, in an effort to present a bill which, if passed in essentially the same form by the House of Representatives as passed by this body, will go to the President as a bill which the President will not veto. I want to believe that the President of the United States will not veto legislation of this scope, which embodies essentially, money-wise and also procedural-wise, the important provisions of the pending measure.

I thank the Senator very much.

Mr. MONRONEY. I am going to yield the floor.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. First, Mr. President, I shall yield to my distinguished friend, the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I thank the Senator from Oklahoma.

If there is wisdom in the suggestion of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD], that the Government ought not build warehouses for the commercial airlines, does it not also follow that the Government ought not help build the terminal facilities for the commercial airlines?

Mr. MONRONEY. My understanding is that the suggestion made by the Senator was not with regard to whether the Government should do so at all, but whether it should do so if private financing were ready, willing, and able to do the job. I think I interpret the question correctly in that statement. Certainly, with regard to terminal facilities, if there is anyone who will build the terminals, the first thing the airport commission likes to say is, "You go ahead and build them."

Mr. LAUSCHE. It would seem to me that there is not a single justification which can be marshaled toward a decision that the taxpayers of this country ought to in any way contribute to the building either of terminals or of warehouses. That is a private business, and the terminals and warehouses ought to be built by the commercial airlines. I should like to hear the Senator's views in that regard.

Mr. MONRONEY. I am told there will be an amendment offered directly on that point. I think it would be more appropriate to discuss the matter at that time.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Is it not the position of the President that the taxpayer has thus far sufficiently subsidized the commercial airlines, that the taxpayer ought to be relieved of the burden, and that the burden should be placed on the commercial airlines?

Mr. MONRONEY. The distinguished Senator has consistently gotten himself mixed up on the traffic figures which have been presented time and again in the committee hearings, and in the full committee.

The traffic figures for 196 civil airports of the United States, at which we have air traffic control towers, show that the traffic volume of the commercial airlines, as a percent of operations, is 27.7 percent, totaling 6,902,160 operations. That refers to landings or takeoffs.

The general aviation—which includes the private flyers, the taxpayers of the community, the people who live in the State, the people who come through with small aircraft—is 51.2 percent of the total of operations, or 12,748,541 as a number of operations.

The military, who enjoy free use in almost every instance of these airports, which are control tower airports, have a use of 21.1 percent, or 5,235,338 landing and takeoff operations.

Therefore, considering all the operations, the commercial airlines use 27.9 percent, the military uses 21.1 percent, and general aviation, which is usually noncommercial of any kind, operates more than half of the landings and takeoffs.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The Senator has not answered my question. My question is, Is it not the position of the President that the taxpayers have already gone beyond the point they should go in subsidizing the commercial airlines, and should there not be a gradual withdrawal, with the burden placed on the commercial airlines?

Mr. MONRONEY. I have never heard the President recommend any withdrawal of subsidies to the airlines. The Senator well knows that practically the only airline subsidies which are being paid today are some approximately $40 million which go to the little feeder airlines, which are supplying the cities and communities which do not have any railroad passenger service. That is the extent of it, except for one or two operations overseas in certain areas where the carrying of the American flag in foreign air transportation is important enough to our foreign commerce and prestige to justify a subsidy.

There is not a trunkline today which is getting Federal subsidies. Northeast Airlines, the last one, was cut off yesterday by the Civil Aeronautics Board as no longer needing or requiring any subsidy.

The business which the Senator's friends talk to him about, and almost the only airline business enjoying a subsidy, are those little feeder airlines which are serving places where the railroads have discontinued any type of passenger service, in order to save some money; places where there is no railroad mail service or anything else. Remember that local feeder operation is all a part of the mail service.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Let us return to the question again. Did the President not begin with a recommendation of a certain amount for 1960 and a reduction of it in 1961?

Mr. MONRONEY. I thought the Senator was talking about airline subsidies. Now the Senator is talking about Federal aid to airports. That is fine. We can talk about that. That is not a subsidy.

Mr. LAUSCHE. We are now engaging in a bit of narrow semantics. Whether it is a subsidy, directly or indirectly, the President wants to get the taxpayer out of putting up all this money for the building of these facilities.

Mr. MONRONEY. Does the Senator mean the Federal taxpayer is putting up all the money?

Mr. LAUSCHE. The taxpayer is putting up 50 percent of the money.

Mr. MONRONEY. And the city puts up the other half.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Fifty percent.

Mr. MONRONEY. That is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The President thinks there ought to be a retreat from that position on the part of the general taxpayers of the country; is that not correct?

Mr. MONRONEY. The distinguished Senator from Ohio has served with a great record of distinction in the State of Ohio. The Senator was reelected and reelected as Governor, and he administered the State well and with great efficiency. He wrote a record which I know will stand for a long time.

Can the Senator name for me the cities in the State of Ohio, within his intimate knowledge, which from now on can put up 100 percent of the money for the airport needs and aviation needs of the great State the Senator has the honor to represent?

Mr. LAUSCHE. I am glad the Senator asked me that question. That is the very point I want to make. Neither the cities nor the Federal Government ought to be putting up the money which they are putting up. More of the money should be put up by the commercial airlines, who are enjoying the benefits of all these facilities.

Mr. MONRONEY. Then the Senator would want the $38 billion highway system, I presume, to be paid for on a toll road basis. The Congress had that suggestion before it. Some people think that would be a better procedure. I do not think so.

The taxpayers of the United States, the users of the highways, are paying the gasoline tax.

Incidentally, aviation is contributing about $50 million into the highway fund every year, from the fuel taxes it pays, and it is very seldom that a DC–6 will use a superhighway.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I should like to conclude the discussion with the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The Senator from Oklahoma has already told me the answer to the question.

Mr. MONRONEY. And the Senator has told me the answer, also.

Mr. LAUSCHE. No.

Mr. MONRONEY. Which I think is important. The Senator does not know of a single community in Ohio, if I understood him correctly, which could put up 100 percent of the necessary money for the facilities shown by the report of the FAA to be needed for the State of Ohio. If the Senator can tell me, I should love to know the names of the cities.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I would venture to say that there is no State and almost no community which is not in a better financial condition, when finances are approached soundly, to do this job than the Federal Government.

The Federal Government is at the point where it cannot sell its bonds. The Government is begging people to buy bonds, but people say, "We would rather buy stocks than bonds. We would rather buy land than bonds." Despite this, we are building up a debt, and increasing the sale of bonds, when we know the public is loathe to buy the bonds.

Mr. MONRONEY. The Senator is now telling us that Ohio, which is listed in the Federal aviation survey for required work, is more capable of doing the work than the Federal Government, and should be given the word to build the $35,485,000 worth of airport required work which the Federal Administrator says should be done.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Unless I answered that question "yes" I would be lying. The State of Ohio is in a far better fiscal position than is the Federal Government.

Mr. MONRONEY. Then the Senator would be glad to have Federal aid to Ohio, which will amount to $11,292,000, withdrawn, in order that Ohio may do its own airport work. Is that correct?

Mr. LAUSCHE. In the long run, the Nation would be better off and Ohio would be better off if the Federal Government got out of the business.

Mr. MONRONEY. Ohio is a part of the Union. If the Senator wishes to amend the bill so as to omit Ohio's share of $11,292,000, I shall be perfectly willing to accept such an amendment, or a similar amendment from any other Senator.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I will not be swayed in my judgment merely because I am told that Ohio will receive $11,292,000. That "sop" cannot be thrown to me for the purpose of changing my judgment.

Mr. MONRONEY. I know what the Senator's judgment is. He voted against the bill in committee. He voted against it last year, in committee. I am not trying to change the Senator's mind. I am too well aware of his position. I respect his right to hold that position. However, the Federal Aviation Administrator has found certain needs to exist in every State; and unless we are satisfied that the cities and towns can build these facilities to the extent of 100 percent, we ought not to say that there will be no program.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield to me for an observation?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Reference has been made to the commercial airlines, in connection with the use of the airports of the country. The able Senator from Ohio is not uninformed on this subject. However, many people have the mistaken idea that the air transport carriers operate their planes into an airport for the landing and take off without the payment of a fee. The airlines pay landing fees in Cleveland, Cincinnati, and the other municipal airports which are serving the very great State of Ohio and its growing population.

I feel, for purposes of the record, that we should set down the fact that landing fees are paid to the operators of the airports, and the operators of the commercial airports, in every degree—with the exception of the Washington National Airport—operate under the jurisdiction of either a State, an authority or the municipality.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I understand that. I went through that experience while I was mayor of Cleveland. I had the most difficult time getting even a semblance of a return by way of payment for the services which we rendered. I know that the city of Dayton is in need of aid. About 5 years ago it made a 25-year lease with TWA on a rate of return that is wholly inadequate to build new runways to accommodate the larger planes.

If the commercial airlines were to build their own warehouses and their own terminals, they would have to pay taxes on such buildings. They would have to maintain them; and they would be placed in a position of near equality of competition with other carriers. They are spared all that; and that is what I complain about.

Mr. MCNAMARA. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks a letter from Mr. James D. Ramsey, Director of the Michigan Department of Aeronautics, which points out, among other things, that the FAA figures indicate that Michigan has need of $26 million for improvements during the forthcoming 4-year period. The study indicates that there is actually a need for $64 million in improvements. I thought that information would be helpful at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MICHIGAN DEPARTMENT OF AERONAUTICS,
Lansing, Mich., February 3, 1959.

Subject: Federal airport program.

Hon. PAT MCNAMARA,
Michigan Senator,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MCNAMARA: Thank you very much for sending me a copy of the testimony offered by General Quesada on S. 1.

I have read this statement with interest and find it difficult to agree with certain statements contained therein. In the first place, General Quesada proposes a $200 million program over the next 4 years and represents it as being sufficient to meet the needs. Yet, the survey conducted by his own agency indicates that the national needs over the same period amount to $1,020 million. This would seem to indicate a $500 million Federal program.

In addition, the figures quoted in the Federal Aviation Agency's study for the State of Michigan do not coincide with the results of our own study. The FAA figures indicate that Michigan has a need of $26 million for improvements during the forthcoming 4 year period, and our study indicates that there is a need for $64 million in improvements.

Secondly, General Quesada recommended that the discretionary fund for the administration of the program be increased from the present 25 percent to 50 percent. This, I would find to be quite objectionable. It is extremely difficult today to cover all segments of aviation in our programs under the 25 percent discretionary feature and it would be multiplied many times if this was increased to 50 percent. If some compromise had to be made on this measure, I feel that the unused State apportionment funds, as they expire, might all accrue to the discretionary fund.

There are a number of other points I could take issue with, however, I think these cover the main items.

Thank you sincerely for sending me a copy of this bill and again, may I express my appreciation to you for your interest and help on our problems.

Sincerely,

JAMES D. RAMSEY,
Director.

DENUNCIATION OF SENATOR HUMPHREY BY PREMIER KHRUSHCHEV

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the news wire services today report a speech delivered in Moscow at the 21st Communist Party Congress by the chairman of the Council of Ministers of the Soviet Union, Premier Nikita Khrushchev, in which he bitterly denounces me and the reports I have made as the result of my visit to the Soviet Union and my interview with the Premier.

I say most respectfully that it is not my desire to engage in debates with a chief of state of another nation. Members of Congress are not privileged to conduct diplomacy—nor should they be. I believe it is fitting and proper, and in good taste, to allow these highly sensitive subjects to be handled by those responsible for American foreign policy.

My interest, as a citizen and as a Senator, has always been and still is to explore ways of lessening tensions and not creating more.

In fairness to myself, I feel compelled to set the record straight in response to Mr. Khrushchev's most recent outburst. Everything I have said about our conversations has been reported by me in good faith for the sake of seeking better relationships and a better understanding of the Soviet Union, of its laws, and of the problems that beset us.

My reports to the public have been factual and objective, and are supported by extensive notes taken in Mr. Khrushchev's presence, with his concurrence.

This outburst of controlled hysteria from the Soviet leader indicates a high degree of insecurity in the relationships between Soviet Russia and the Communist Chinese. I digress to point out that Khrushchev's remarks centered around the report I made concerning conversations about the Chinese Communists. I am surprised that he would go to such trouble and to such a high pitch of vituperation.

Methinks Premier Khrushchev doth protest too much—to wax Shakespearean for a moment. He is obviously under tremendous pressure from within his own party and from the Chinese Communist leaders to disavow the statements he made to me respecting Soviet economic policy and relationship between the Soviet leaders and the Chinese Communist leaders.

Premier Khrushchev knows full well that when I asked him about Communist China, I made it perfectly clear that I was not attempting to inquire about Soviet-Chinese military or political relationships. I made but one inquiry about China. It was about the Chinese communes. This inquiry was made of Mr.

Khrushchev as it was of the Soviet Minister of Agriculture, whom I also interviewed. Mr. Khrushchev's reply to me has been accurately reported, just as I pointed out that Mr. Khrushchev said that the People's Republic of China was his "good ally."

With equal candor he told me that the communes had been tried in Russia and had failed, primarily because of the lack of incentive for production. This conversation is reported accurately and in detail in the Life magazine article. If this causes Mr. Khrushchev to denounce me, then indeed I must have touched a very sensitive political nerve.

Mr. Khrushchev knew, when I talked to him, of my vigorous opposition to communism and to many of the Soviet's policies. Indeed he referred to this in his speech before the 21st Communist Party Congress. Likewise I knew of his opposition to democratic capitalism and our military and foreign policies. There was no misunderstanding about our respective points of view. Nevertheless, we had a frank and candid talk, which I thought was helpful.

Mr. Khrushchev did suggest that I convey his remarks about the Berlin crisis to President Eisenhower, and Khrushchev's willingness to guarantee free access to West Berlin. That is the identical statement that was made to the German Ambassador in Moscow only yesterday. That same thing was said on December 1, in our conversation.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator repeat that last statement?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. Khrushchev suggested that I convey his remarks about the Berlin crisis to President Eisenhower, and Khrushchev's willingness to guarantee free access to West Berlin. I said that he made the same statement to the West German Ambassador in Moscow yesterday. The words he used in his statement to the German Ambassador are almost identical with the words he used in our conversation on December 1. Mr. Khrushchev did tell me of a recent Soviet nuclear explosion, which I reported to our Government, and he did say to me, "I will let you in on a secret," when he discussed one of the Soviet rockets, with a 14,000 kilometer range.

What Premier Khrushchev is concerned about is not what I have said, but about the growing pressure from the Tito Yugoslav Communists who have shattered the solidarity of the Communist bloc. This is what he refers to at length in his speech when he calls them the revisionists.

It is rather significant that Mr. Khrushchev's now adverse reaction was not made known when my remarks were first publicized; rather, his denials are only now coming forth, in the midst of the Communist Party's policy meeting, after the Soviet First Minister has been criticized by some of his satellites.

Mr. Khrushchev appears particularly sensitive, and understandably so, to having some of his remarks about Red Chinese communes publicized. I repeat, that was the only conversation between us about China. Yet it might be well to remind him that his First Deputy, Mr. Mikoyan, made similar comments while he was in this country, reaffirming what Mr. Khrushchev had told me.

My only suggestion is that Mr. Khrushchev recall one point in our conversation on which we did agree—and I conclude on this note—that the cause of peace would be better served if we quit name calling and concentrated instead on ways in which we might better work together for a just and lasting peace.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL AIRPORT ACT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1) to amend the Federal Airport Act in order to extend the time for making grants under the provisions of such act, and for other purposes.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, my home in Rahway, N.J., is close to Newark Airport and the city of Elizabeth, which experienced the most frightful series of tragic coincidences in aviation history. The memory of three major plane crashes in the city within a matter of weeks is still fresh in my mind; it is a potent reminder of my responsibility to help assure the adequacy of navigational and landing systems at our airports.

Beyond any shadow of a doubt, the Federal Government has the overriding responsibilty for providing air safety.

Yesterday morning the Federal Aviation Agency advised my office that tragedies such as have just occurred at La Guardia would not be affected in any way by the amount of funds made available under S. 1, the airport bill reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, or the Republican proposals which are being offered instead. The funds provided by S. 1 or the Republican alternate would go toward the construction of physical plant at airports throughout the country.

The adequacy of electronic navigation and landing systems may be involved at La Guardia. This is a vital safety question and should be thoroughly aired.

But such systems are provided by separate legislation recommended by the President, which is in no way related to the purposes of the Airport Act we are being asked to extend today.

This year the President is requesting almost $500 million for air safety programs—navigational aids and the like—apart from the pending airport bill. Next year the President will request more than $500 million for such air safety measures.

Federal funds, Mr. President, should insure safe and efficient transit for air passengers and cargo. It is wholly appropriate that the Federal Government's share of this airport-aid program should include those beyond-the-gate facilities such as runways, taxiways, aprons, tower facilities, and all the rest.

But in these days of unbalanced and near-balanced budgets—when demands on the Federal budget must meet criteria of priority—terminals and restaurants should be supported by the States and the communities they serve and make prosperous.

My Republican colleagues and I on the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce support an alternate measure to S. 1, which is the $575 million proposal of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY]. We would provide $63 million—the same figure available in the current fiscal year—for each of 4 years. According to the best available estimates, our program would meet the Federal share of the funds required to promote air safety "beyond the gate," on the usual matching basis with each State. It would assure continuity of Federal programs and would fully recognize the principle of Federal primacy in this safety field.

Mr. President, in an economy where the threat of inflation is a constant source of concern, the Congress is faced with difficulty budgetary decisions this year. I believe we should make savings wherever we can possibly do so.

It seems to me S. 1 is the right place to start. Restaurants and restrooms cannot compete with Federal requirements for defense, for education, for decent housing for our people, and for many programs where there is little alternative to Federal contributions.

S. 1 does not do everything it says it would. The Republican alternate, in the long run, may provide greater flexibility for airport development, whether for conventional or for jet aircraft. We are still far from having definitive answers to such questions as the best location of jet airports.

The Democrats' special $65 million fund to gear up big-city airports for the jet age would tend to freeze jet-airport development in these areas exclusively. With only a few jet transports now in operation, who can say whether local citizen-acceptance, safety, and other factors will tie, forever, jet airports to present big-city locations?

To freeze large-scale allocations to city areas alone may be wasting money on a grand and unplanned scale. Many questions have been raised as to the desirability of locating jet airports away from cities, and they deserve serious consideration.

All in all, Mr. President, there are convincing reasons why the Republican proposals should be adopted, rather than S. 1 as reported by our committee.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I realize that the Federal airport bill is a very important legislative proposal. It has been very carefully considered, it has been checked into in detail, and a great deal of work and effort has gone into it. The entire subject is of vital importance to our Nation, particularly to our transportation picture.

At the outset I wish to say that there are those who earnestly disagree with the administration's position and with those of us on the minority side and others who are interested in this subject.

Personally, I feel that the bill before the Senate involves more money than the facts and circumstances and the history of the need justify. Hence the approach of giving consideration to our substitute, which would extend the law under which the Government is presently operating.

There may be differences of opinion as to amount and need. I know that from the beginning of this session we have been going along somewhat under forced draft, and that we are perhaps not able to give full consideration to certain phases of a subject because of the haste in which we are approaching it.

Yesterday the Senate approved one of the biggest omnibus housing programs in history. Today we are debating the airport bill, which carries almost twice the amount of money which we believe is justifiably needed.

The term "inflation" is tricky. It always sounds like something that happens to someone else. But inflation is just another way of referring to ever-increasing prices—prices everyone of us in the United States will have to pay.

There was inflation in the housing bill, and there is inflation in the airport bill today. Both these bills call for spending beyond foreseeable revenues. Both will contribute their share to cheapening the American dollar.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield, or does he prefer to complete his address before yielding?

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. If possible, I should like to complete my statement.

Mr. CLARK. I shall be happy to defer my questioning until then.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. My prime objection to S. 1 is that it hears the cry for help from the Nation's airports through an amplifying device, and the response is as if the multiplied cry measures the true distress in those areas. Admittedly, there is a figure floating around which indicates that the Nation's airports have a combined need for $1,290 million.

The distinguished Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY], the chairman of the Subcommittee on Aviation, indicated how that figure was arrived at. I think it is probably factually correct, so far as I know.

Consider with me, though, the source of that raw figure and its tremendous capacity for overstatement and inbuilt error.

In assembling data for a study of airport needs, the Federal Aviation Agency collected estimates of needs at 3,000 airports in the United States and its Territories. The local airport people in each instance submitted their estimates of what it would cost to improve their own airports in the ways in which they would like to see them improved during the next 4 years.

At some locations, mainly the larger airports, the plans were well prepared and contained defensible estimates of dollar costs.

At other locations, however, the plans were somewhat like utopian or fantastic dreams, calling for facilities and accommodations unlikely to be required in this century.

All of these estimates of costs were funneled into the Federal Aviation Agency through its field offices, which were much too busy, in the short time available, to analyze the cost estimates or appraise the suitability of many of the plans. They had no time to check the readiness of the local communities to put up their matching shares, or the responsibilities which the local authorities would be required to meet with the Federal Government granting these funds.

The plans included everything—acquisition of lands and easements, grading and draining of sites, construction of buildings, control towers, lighting systems, runways, taxiways, and aprons.

The combined cost estimate on this 4-year total of unanalyzed needs came to $1,290 million.

The proponents of S. 1, recognizing that, in the past, Federal aid to airports has been granted on a matching basis—and, I think, fairly, as the Senator from Oklahoma pointed out—took roughly half of the big figure as constituting the rock bottom need for Federal funds. Thus we arrive at the so-called justification for a program calling for the spending, according to the revised figure, of $465 million over 4 years.

I am very much pleased that the Senator from Oklahoma and those who concurred with him in sponsoring S. 1 saw fit this morning, as the distinguished majority leader pointed out, to ask that the bill be amended so as to cover 4 years instead of 5. That is a saving of $100 million as compared with the original estimate of $565 million for a period of 5 years.

There are some other improvements in the bill which I think are very helpful.

I do not propose that we shake the raw airport needs figure down merely in the hope of achieving a lower estimate of total cost. I am sincere when I make that statement.

I do suggest that the years of experience in working with the various Federal airport acts give us—and should give us—a sound means of appraising the relation which will finally exist between what I think are the original inflated estimates and the hard cash which finally will be laid out.

Experience tells us that initially, for example, not all of the airports which voice needs for money will apply for Federal matching funds. The reasons for this are numerous, but there is a solid core of experience to justify saying that not more than one-fifth of the 3,000 airports listed in the 1960 national airport plan will come forward with their own matching funds and ask for a firm grant-in-aid.

No doubt many of the airports that do not follow their reports of needs with claims for grants-in-aid can be found in the 18 States which have not yet used the Federal airport funds available to them under the area-and-population apportionment formula.

Mr. President, at the conclusion of my remarks I plan to offer a statement with reference to what I have just said about the 18 States. I shall offer an exhibit entitled "Federal Aid Airport Program; States Having Unused State Apportionment Balances for the Fiscal Years 1956 to the Present Time in 1959."

If the experience of the Federal Aviation Agency and its predecessor, the Civil Aeronautics Authority, can be taken as a guide, the combined estimates of need reported from those same 18 States are inflated by 100 percent.

Mr. President, at this point I wish to say that I shall also offer for the RECORD a list of the 14 States which are not using all the funds allocated to them. The list shows how much they are requesting for the calendar year 1960. So the list bears exactly on the point I am now making.

Thus, we can cut in half the needs reported from airports in these 18 States, and thus we can diminish by about $100 million the total stated needs, and we can diminish by $50 million the required Federal participation.

Again, the experience of the agencies shows that there is about a 20 percent washout of the needs reported by middle-sized airports—ones not located in the 18 States just mentioned, and not included among the 100 largest airports of the Nation. If we take account of this 20 percent overstatement of need, we can again diminish by about $100 million the total stated need, and we can diminish by another $50 million the required Federal participation.

Thus far, we have shaved $100 million off the required Federal participation, and this without touching the big airports in the great metropolitan air-commerce centers. Such airports account for a huge part of the stated need for airport development. That point has been touched on already, and probably it will be touched on further by Senators who will speak after I conclude my remarks.

But the big metropolitan airports are also moneymakers. Passenger traffic through them is so heavy that huge sums are obtained simply from renting advertising space on the corridor and waiting-room walls. In the big airports, all of us have seen industrial displays and fine arrays of smart shops which do a thriving business. I do not want anyone to gain the impression that I am opposed to that. I think that is the mark of genius of good businessmen and business groups who take advantage of the opportunity to put their best foot forward in an effort to attract the attention of the people who use the airports, and who, as time passes, are using them increasingly.

Because a good airport is good business, the metropolitan centers have not waited for Federal handouts to complete their own airports. That is very commendable. Many of them have gone ahead, with their own funds, and have built as they chose.

The city of Toledo, Ohio, for example, built its express airport without a nickel of Federal funds. I note in the Chamber at this time the distinguished senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE], who is very much interested in this airport bill, and who has contributed much to it. I am sure he will corroborate what I have stated, particularly in the case of the great airports of the large cities of his State.

Many other cities have accepted some Federal assistance; but, historically, the big metropolitan areas have paid 75 percent of their airport costs.

They can do even better, if put to the task, because today commercial aviation is an impressively big industry. The attractive new services it offers are pulling more and more passengers to the airports, where they contribute, directly or indirectly, to paying the capital and operating costs.

Thus, it is that increased passenger and cargo volume, which gives rise to the need for airport improvements, is every day more important as the source of revenues to pay the cost of such improvements.

In recognition of all this, the Federal aviation agency and its predecessor have by administrative rule declined to pay more than $1 million a year on any single airport project. Nevertheless, the big metropolitan areas have found it worth their while to spend millions of their own funds to have good airports. In my opinion, that is as it should be, for they are the ones who profit most from, and obtain the greatest benefit from, the expansion of their airport facilities and their utilization as increased traffic passes through them. They will continue to do so. Thus, we can, with clear conscience, write off 75 percent of the expressed needs of the Nation's 100 largest airports.

In the 1960 national airport plan, their total stated need is about $390 million for runways, land, lights, control towers, and so forth, not counting their requirements in the way of terminals and administration buildings.

Here, at one stroke, we reduce by $292½ million the total stated airport need, and we reduce by about $146 million the required Federal participation.

If, in addition, we call on the 100 largest airports to do as they have done in the past—namely, to pay 75 percent of the cost of their own terminals and administration buildings—we can lop off another $62 million.

Admittedly, my figures are rough; but they are at least rooted in the experience of the Federal Aviation Agency and the Civil Aeronautics Administration.

When totaled, they show that there is too much fat in the stated national airport needs, and an overstatement, to the tune of from $300 million to $315 million, of the required Federal participation.

It would be possible, of course, Mr. President, to produce a clean-cut set of figures, and to declare them to be the last statistical word on our national airport needs.

I do not want to be guilty of that, because the more I examine the figures on airport needs, the more I am convinced that they are a happy compound of guess, hopeful expectation, and calculation, capable of serving well our purpose, if only we remember to use commonsense in dealing with them.

The best commonsense approach is to follow a program that has already proved itself by working well. The present Federal Airport Act is, in my judgment, such a program.

It has provided, I say candidly to my colleagues, enough money to keep our airports reasonably abreast of current needs. It is true that the advent of jets will require peak obligational authority in fiscal 1960–61. That information comes by way of the experience and the testimony of General Quesada and his associates, who studied this matter carefully and closely. But ample funds to meet the peak needs are provided under the amendment I shall submit.

Mr. President, we who have signed the minority views believe that the needs of aviation and the needs of the country will best be served by extending the present Federal Airport Act for 4 years, at an annual level of $63 million.

Accordingly, I submit, and send to the desk, an amendment in the nature of a substitute for Senate bill 1, and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The amendment in the nature of a substitute, submitted by Mr. SCHOEPPEL, on behalf of himself, Mr. COTTON, and Mr. MORTON, was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the first sentences of sections 5(a) and 5(b) of the Federal Airport Act (49 U.S.C. 1104(a)) are amended by striking out 'for each of the fiscal years ending June 30, 1957, June 30, 1958, and June 30, 1959' and inserting in lieu thereof 'for each of the following fiscal years through the fiscal year ending June 30, 1963'.

"SEC. 2. Section 6(c) of the Federal Airport Act (49 U.S.C. 1105(c)) is amended to read as follows:

" '(c) Any amount apportioned for projects in a State pursuant to subsection (a) of this section which has not been obligated by grant agreement at the expiration of the fiscal year for which it was first authorized to be obligated and the fiscal year immediately following shall be added to the discretionary fund established by subsection (b) of this section.'

"SEC. 3. The Federal Airport Act is further amended as follows:

" '(1) In section 2(7) strike out the Territory of Alaska.".

" '(2) In section 3(a) strike out "the Territory of Alaska,", and strike out "the Territories" and insert in lieu thereof "the Territory of Hawaii".

" '(3) In section 5(b) strike out "Territories of Alaska and" and insert in lieu thereof "Territory of", and strike out "45 per centum shall be available for projects in the Territory of Alaska, 25 per centum" and insert in lieu thereof "25 per centum shall be available".

" '(4) In section 7 strike out "in the Territory of Alaska,".

" '(5) In section 9(c) strike out "the Territory of Alaska,".

" '(6) In section 10(c) strike out "the Territory of Alaska and'."

"SEC 4. The Federal Airport Act, as amended, is further amended by adding a new section to read as follows:

" 'INTERSTATE COMPACTS

" 'SEC. 21. The consent of Congress is hereby given to each of the several States to enter into any agreement or compact, not in conflict with any law of the United States, with any other State or States for the purpose of developing or operating airport facilities. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this section is expressly reserved.' "

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, Senators who are now in attendance will note that there has been proposed a provision for interstate compacts, following the general form of compacts entered into by the States by authority of the Federal Government. This amendment is in the nature of a substitute.

The purpose of the amendment is to provide for a continuation for 4 years of the present law respecting funds available for airport construction. The amounts of money involved are as follows:

Annual obligation authorization for projects in States, $60 million; and annual obligation authorization for projects in Territories and possessions, $3 million.

There are two minor changes of the present law contained in the substitute proposal.

First, a change is made with respect to the treatment of the State of Alaska.

She is no longer a Territory. Alaska is in fact a State. She is entitled to all the consequences and prerogatives of assuming statehood. This is a forthright acceptance of a basic fact of life, and conforms with Alaska's proper sense of her own dignity.

As a practical matter, treatment of Alaska as a State will entitle her to a larger portion of State-apportionment funds than she enjoys under present law or would enjoy under S. 1. At the same time she would be in the position of having to increase the amount of matching funds from 25 percent to 37½ percent. However, the President has proposed in his budget message a sum of $10½ million as an overall transitional grant to Alaska for all purposes, to make allowance for some of the problems she faces in her early period of statehood. These funds would be available to assist her in providing matching funds.

The second change in the existing law made by this amendment deals with redistribution of funds authorized by the law.

Under the act, funds apportioned to any State remain available for a period of 2 years, and then go into a fund for reapportionment back to the 48 States.

Under the provision of the substitute amendment such unused or unobligated funds would be transferred to the discretionary fund at the end of 2 years.

As a practical matter, the process of reapportionment freezes unduly large amounts over extended periods, and is an extremely inefficient procedure in terms of utilization of scarce resources.

As I indicated briefly before, section 4 adds the text of section 9 of S. 1 as reported by the committee, and this section deals with interstate compacts.

The reason why we desire to offer the present substitute, with the modifications and changes to which I have referred, is that there are varying degrees of emphasis placed upon the needs of aviation and upon the surveys made, which I think were hurried surveys, and were not calculated to ascertain what the vital needs were and are.

Thus is presented a proposal for the benefit of those of us who felt the administration proposal for $200 million was not enough. Under the present proposal the amount of funds, if provided is considerably larger. Over the 4-year period there will be a difference of 50-some million dollars, together with the carryover.

We have under consideration a law, which I need not tell Senators, has worked well. That law has run the gantlet of several years of careful scrutiny, several years of demands that have been made from the various States. It certainly provides one thing, namely, the means of determining how many States and how many communities are actually interested in improving airports, even under the generous provisions in the present aviation law.

We find 14 of the States of our Union did not completely avail themselves of the present law. The record will show that, and I am sure will be offered for the benefit of those who desire to read the record. Therefore, we have offered the opportunity to vote for a bill, as a substitute for S. 1, which will carry in it more money than did the original administration bill which was proposed and introduced, and which was considered when the committee considered the pending bill, and which provided for only $200 million.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a couple of questions at that point?

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Will the Senator indulge me for just a moment so that I may offer several matters for the RECORD?

I offer for the RECORD, and ask unanimous consent to have printed, a table headed "Federal-Aid Airport Program: States Having Unused State Apportionment Balances, Fiscal Years 1956–59."

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Federal-aid airport program—States having unused State apportionment balances, fiscal years 1956–59

Arkansas	$159,902	622,864	$623,699	$36,298

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I offer for the RECORD, and ask unanimous consent to have printed, a table showing a record of 14 States which have not used the funds they could have used showing what they thought they would require for development of airports in 1959 to 1962. The table indicates the estimated needs. I thought it would be helpful to have that table in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Next 4 years, 1959–62, total estimated needs of States never using all of their apportioned airport funds

Arkansas	$5,515,000
Colorado	30,308,000
Delaware	2,993,000
Idaho	5,954,000
Kansas	12,595,000
Maine	9,817,000
Montana	9,888,000
Nebraska	15,759,000
New Mexico	14,312,000
North Dakota	5,466,000
Oregon	9,659,000
South Carolina	9,144,000
South Dakota	6,935,000
Wyoming	5,444,000

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I also offer for the RECORD, and ask unanimous consent to have printed, a table entitled "Federal-Aid Airport Program: Federal Funds Allocated to Buildings and Related Terminal Area Development Under Public Law 211," for the fiscal years 1956 to 1959.

I might add that 14 of the States did not use up the money made available. That is a matter of history and factual information.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Finally, Mr. President, I offer for the RECORD, and ask unanimous consent to have printed, an article which appeared in Barron's National Business and Financial Weekly, under date of January 26, 1959, entitled "No Grounds for Subsidy. Federal Aid to Airports Is Neither Necessary Nor Wise," because the analysis points up some matters which are very important.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NO GROUNDS FOR SUBSIDY—FEDERAL AID TO AIRPORTS IS NEITHER NECESSARY NOR WISE

One man, so philosophers have said, on the side of right constitutes a majority. To some observers of national affairs, the old saying seemed peculiarly appropriate last week as the new Congress opened hearings on the controversial issue of Federal aid to airports. For to judge by the record of the previous session, the spokesman for the administration—Under Secretary of Commerce Louis W. Rothschild then, Gen. E. R. Quesada now—is likely to be the lone voice raised against the extravagant measure proposed by the Democrats. Lined up in favor will be a formidable array of public and private groups, including, among others, the Air Line Pilots Association, the Air Transport Association, the Airport Operators Council, the American Municipal Association, the U.S. Conference of Mayors and, not least, the AFL–CIO. Among lawmakers of both parties, moreover, sentiment for the bill reportedly is running strong.

Despite the lopsided balance of opinion on Capitol Hill—indeed, one might add, because of it—the White House deserves the thanks of every taxpayer. What the majority is urging is ill-timed and costly; over a 5-year span, the pending legislation would authorize the outlay of more than a half-billion dollars. Inevitably it also would thrust the Federal Government further into a sphere which should be the primary concern of municipalities and States. In the fair name of aviation progress, finally, it would perpetuate the national subsidy of activities that are essentially commercial and, in consequence, properly self-supporting. The special interests which such a measure would benefit naturally have closed ranks behind it. By taking an unyielding stand on the matter, however, even to the point of a veto if necessary, the President unmistakably is striking a blow on behalf of the national interest.

The blow has been a long time coming. For 12 years, under an act originally passed in 1946 and subsequently extended, Washington has been contributing generously to the construction and expansion of airport facilities. During this span its grants, which must be matched dollar for dollar by funds raised locally, have run as high as $50 million per year. Last winter, as part of a massive program to combat the recession, the Democrats drew up a more ambitious blueprint. Among other things, their new Federal Airport Act called for raising the Treasury ante to $100 million per year over the next half decade. In addition, it would have established a special fund of $75 million, designed to be spent immediately. The bill, which sailed easily through the 85th Congress, was pocket vetoed. Now, as S. 1, it has become the first order of business before the 86th.

To its support undoubtedly will rally everyone concerned in any way with air transportation. Save for the harried Mr. Rothschild (who, by the way, since has resigned), witnesses at the 1958 hearings, as noted, unanimously urged its passage. In their view, the public welfare and national defense, especially in the newly dawned jet age, demand bigger and better airports. This may or may not be true—without the help of Senator MONRONEY and his colleagues, after all, American Airlines yesterday launched the first regularly scheduled transcontinental jet flights. In any case, the argument should not obscure the fact that the pending measure has been poorly conceived, hastily drawn, and badly timed. S. 1, for example, still refers to the "Territory" of Alaska. Even more revealing, despite the remarkable economic recovery, the bill, like its predecessor in recession-ridden 1958, calls for an immediate step-up in Federal spending.

The great defect of the legislation, however, lies less in its timing than in its fundamental approach. For S. 1 in the main merely would perpetuate a system of Federal aid which, experience has shown, stands badly in need of overhaul. True, one improvement would be made. Under existing law, U.S. grants may be used to help defray the cost of restaurants, parking lots, bars and like facilities which are merely incidental to an airport's mission. In tacit acknowledgment of the need for a change, the pending bill would crack down on such luxuries. At the same time, however, it would continue to underwrite a number of other, more serious follies. For example, it would leave untouched the current method of allocating U.S. funds, which is based not on national needs, as the President has urged, but largely on such political considerations as population and area. Under this formula Federal money has helped to build many local installations of doubtful commercial or military value; in contrast, its contribution to such major fields as New York's Idlewild has been small.

Worst of all, the proposed measure would continue to place the financial burden on the wrong shoulders. For it is clear that airports need not depend so heavily on the U.S. Treasury; as revenue-producing facilities, they can draw upon the airlines, operators of private planes such as businessmen and farmers, and many others who can afford to pay for what they get. In addition, as widely recognized community assets, such facilities, if necessary, have a legitimate claim on local assistance. An airport, in short, should be supported not by U.S. taxpayers, but by users and those who, directly or indirectly, profit from its existence. Nor is this merely theory. The State of Minnesota, for instance, has established in the Twin Cities a Metropolitan Airports Commission which enjoys limited taxing power. In Miami, Dade County's International Airport is not just free of deficit; it actually operates in the black.

Such cases are admittedly exceptions to the rule. Yet they represent a goal toward which other communities should strive—and toward which the administration, in a moderate program of its own, plainly is pointing. Just as plainly, the legislation now pending in the Senate, far from speeding the day when airports throughout the country become self-sustaining, would tend to delay it, for at least 5 years and perhaps longer. The United States wants and needs adequate landing fields and runways. Valuable though they are, however, they should not be bought at the expense of what is financially prudent and morally right.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I yield now to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK. May I ask the Senator whether Pennsylvania is not excluded from the list of States which did not use available funds?

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Pennsylvania is not listed on the table showing the States having unused State apportionment balances for the fiscal years 1956 to 1959.

Mr. CLARK. Earlier in his very able talk, the distinguished Senator from Kansas indicated his view that the bill would contribute to inflation. I wonder if the Senator would tell the Members of the Senate why he thinks the bill is inflationary.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I do not recall my exact words, but it has been indicated—and I subscribe to the view generally—that any time we in the Senate of the United States or in the National Congress pass measures which go far beyond the income the Government of the United States receives, such measures are bound to be inflationary, because somebody has to borrow the money.

Mr. CLARK. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I am sure the able Senator from Pennsylvania would agree that if we continue doing this we will only get into an inflationary spiral, of which I am frankly fearful. I would much rather curtail in certain degrees than run the hazard of further cheapening of the dollar.

Mr. CLARK. I could not agree with the Senator more. My point has always been, however, that there is no inflationary effect of Federal expenditures if the budget is balanced. Would the Senator agree with me on that?

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I think in such circumstance there is far less effect than if we carry it the next step forward.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator would agree, would he not, that the activities, whether of the Government or of private industry, which generate profits and income, and thus return taxable income to the Treasury and increase the gross national product, are salutary?

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I quite agree. If we can add to the overall income, which can be used as a tax base, there will be no necessity for running deficits, for which we will have to do borrowing and more borrowing.

Mr. CLARK. I think the Senator and I are substantially in accord.

I wish to turn to another subject. The Senator said in the course of his remarks that hardly one-fifth of the 3,000 airports in the country would come forward with matching funds. I think I state the Senator's remarks correctly.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I believe the Senator is correct as to what I said in my statement.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to point out that in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania we have 49 publicly owned airports. About three-fifths of these airports, 29 out of 49, have applications either pending or in preparation for matching funds.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I will say to the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania that we were using the figures and exact amounts as shown by the survey for the entire United States. I believe I am correct. As I recall, from a little more than 3,000 airports in the neighborhood of 600 or 590—some place in that range—availed themselves of the program. That was the reason for the statement.

Mr. CLARK. I wonder whether the Senator could enlighten me as to whether it is likely the vast majority of those airports which have not called for Federal funds are small, private airports in relatively remote parts of the country so far as the volume of air traffic is concerned? Have not most of the large airports in the densely populated parts of the United States already applied for Federal aid?

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I want to answer the Senator if I can. I do not think that is necessarily the case, because some of the large airports have been built and paid for in some of these other areas.

Mr. CLARK. Most of the large airports—such as the two largest in Pennsylvania, Pittsburgh and Philadelphia—still have to make substantial expenditures to meet the necessity for enlarging and strengthening the runways to take care of the jetplanes which will soon be seeking to land on the runways. I think that would be generally true throughout the country.

I would suggest that the fact that 29 of the 49 publicly owned airports in Pennsylvania are prepared to put up matching funds and will require $45 million of Federal aid before the end of 1962, which they will match with $45 million of their own, is some indication that the amount provided in the bill is not too high?

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to comment on the remarks of my good friend and colleague from Pennsylvania. The needs which total $1,290 million are the needs of roughly 3,000 airports in the Nation. That includes far more than the 49 airports in Pennsylvania. The Senator is speaking of commercial airports?

Mr. CLARK. I am speaking of publicly owned airports.

Mr. MORTON. Public airports.

Mr. CLARK. Publicly owned airports.

Mr. MORTON. But these 3,000 airports, as to which the figure of need was obtained, cover more than the 49 in the State of Pennsylvania. In the great Commonwealth of Pennsylvania there surely would be more than such a small percentage of the total of 3,000.

Mr. CLARK. Many of the airports would be very small airports, for private aircraft. One would not be apt to get much of a request for a Federal contribution from them.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator is correct. Those airports will not come into the program. That is the point. However, their needs are in the $1.3 billion figure. The needs have been included.

Mr. CLARK. For that reason, as I understand the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma and his colleagues on the majority side of the committee, a cut was made down to $465 million. It was not a cut in the need, but it was a cut to meet one-half of the need.

Mr. MORTON. The Federal Government is supposed to meet only half the need.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator is correct.

Mr. MORTON. The figure was cut originally to $575 million. The needs figures result from the "letter to Santa Claus" approach, when everyone put in all of his needs, for the 3,000 airports, which cover considerably more than the 49 in the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. I wonder if my good friend from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY] heard the reference of my good friend from Kentucky to the bill as the "letter to Santa Claus" approach.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? I did not refer to the bill as a "letter to Santa Claus" approach at all.

Mr. CLARK. Then I must have misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. MORTON. I want to correct that, because I am in sympathy with the objectives of the bill, and I think we have an obligation in this regard. I refer to the $1.3 billion figure as being the result of what I term a "letter to Santa Claus" approach, in which everyone was asked, "What are your needs?" Of course, they were not laggardly or remiss or backward about stating needs.

If someone should ask me what I need for the next 5 years, I am afraid the list would be very long indeed.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I am glad to yield.

Mr. MONRONEY. The distinguished senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCNAMARA] put into the RECORD a few minutes ago, when my distinguished colleague was off the floor, some information to show that the need figure of $1.3 billion is certainly not a "letter to Santa Claus" approach. I hope the Senator will tell the Senate more about this item.

The information was obtained from the aviation commissioner, who is in charge of disbursement of all State matching funds. That gentleman certainly knows what the needs are and what his State's matching ability is.

Mr. MCNAMARA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. MCNAMARA. The director of the aviation authority in Michigan indicates that under the bill the State of Michigan over the designated period would receive $26 million. According to the Director, there is a need for more than $64 million in this period of time. The need can be demonstrated.

The Commissioner indicated in the communication that the current bill is totally inadequate to meet the needs of the States. He dealt with several other figures, and I did put them in the RECORD. I think a very good case was made for the higher figure. I thank the Senator.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I am glad to yield further.

Mr. MONRONEY. I have also heard from the Senator from Wyoming. I do not have the exact figures available, but it is my understanding that the aviation people advised the Senator that they underestimated the requirements and the ability of the State of Wyoming to provide local matching funds. I understand they put down one-third of what they now say are their actual needs for which they are able to provide matching money.

It is not an overestimated figure that we are charging for the new child or prodigy in the Federal Aviation Administration. Apparently, from what the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania, the distinguished Senator from Michigan, and the distinguished Senator from Wyoming have said, in those three instances the figure is underestimated by a great amount. The figure is only approximately one-third of what is required in Michigan, or what is required in Wyoming—and I did not get the total figure for Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. Our figure was $45 million through 1962, representing our need for Federal funds in excess of local and State funds which are available in the same amount. I was suggesting that the figure in the Senator's bill was not too high.

Mr. MONRONEY. I think we are on the frugal side. I do not think there will be nearly enough to meet the fund requests of the municipalities and the States, but, at the same time, I do not think we are in a budgetary position where we can go overboard. That is why any pressures to reduce the amounts in the bill must be resisted, if we want anything that will remotely approach meeting the needs of our country and the requirements which the Federal Aviation Agency itself is insisting be met in order to modernize airports.

Mr. CLARK. What is happening in the airport field is similar to what is happening in the urban renewal field. As certain airline carriers in my State, such as Allegheny Airlines, pick up more and more communities and put them on their schedule, the demand accelerates. I have no doubt that, just as in the case of slum clearance and urban renewal, so in the case of the airports, there will be an increasing demand which must be met from some source, or we shall have a second-class aviation system.

Mr. MONRONEY. And not a safe aviation system. No matter how much we spend upstairs, we can waste money above unless we have facilities beneath for the planes to get home on.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I should like to make an observation with reference to the point to which the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania referred. I was trying to point out what was before our committee on this question, as related to the experience of the past 3 years or more, including the remaining part of this year. It was definitely shown, at least according to the information which was submitted, that the States did not use the amounts which had been allocated to them. I think I am safe in saying that the record shows that the Agency did not, in any 1 year, pay out as much as $60 million.

I recognize that aviation is a growing industry. It is an expensive industry, both from the standpoint of planes and the standpoint of extension of the runways. God knows, they will be stretching out for 2 or 3 miles unless the manufacturers of planes reach a point in their experimentation where the length of the runway can be shortened and the runway will still be safe and practical.

I well understand—and I know the Senator from Pennsylvania must agree with me—that, without attributing ulterior motives to a community or group, if it can get something, it is not going to subtract from its requests. It is going to add. It would be fine if we had a surplus of $50 billion or $75 billion in our Government. But when I see the terrific debt and the erosion of the dollar—and I am no expert—I know that the people on fixed incomes who buy goods are seriously concerned over what may happen to our Nation if this erosion continues.

So long as we are Members of this body—and some of us will be here longer than others—we shall have some unpleasant times unless we face up to the realities.

I am not saying that this one bill, or the bill which we passed last night, will break the fiscal back of the country. But I say, with all the sincerity in my soul, that when we add up all the spending, and multiply it, it will break the back of the country economically. I do not wish to be a party to it. I would rather forgo some things.

History shows that in many instances States which have had the opportunity and privilege of coming in for grants-in-aid did not do so. Perhaps they were not alive to the opportunities. I rather suspect that they were aware that this is a great, growing industry. Somehow or other the history of the past 3½ years has not demonstrated the need for $465 million.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I believe that I discussed with my friend from Kansas a little earlier the inflationary impact, if any, of this bill. We were pretty well agreed that if the budget were balanced by increasing revenues there would be no inflationary effect.

I do not wish to prolong the discussion. In order to terminate the discussion on this subject, in which I am so vitally interested, I should like to turn to one final factor.

My good friend from Kansas suggested that the 100 largest airports in the country should be eliminated from the program. Is that correct?

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. No. I said that the historical background showed that they were practically eliminating themselves, because they went ahead and made these great improvements.

Mr. CLARK. This happens to be a subject on which I have had a little experience. The airports made those improvements shortly after World War II, before they went broke, as they are now, after taxes had been raised to the extent it seemed wise and prudent to ask citizens to pay.

My friend stated that the large airports were making money. I was pretty well convinced that they were not, so I asked my administrative assistant to telephone the manager of the airport in Philadelphia to find out how they were doing. I found that, just as the Philadelphia airport was losing money when I was mayor, it lost over $1 million last year, after taking into account debt charges and a normal rate of depreciation.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. The distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania is thoroughly familiar with the Philadelphia situation, and I would not dispute him for a moment. However, I understand that my colleague [Mr. COTTON], who is the ranking minority member of the Aviation Subcommittee, will have something to say in connection with a check which he has made on this point. I do not know whether his study included the airports in the great State of Pennsylvania or not, but the record is rather revealing as to the moneymaking possibilities and the profits from some of them, all of which makes us very happy, because it means that other taxpayers do not have to pay as much in taxes.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I yield.

Mr. MORTON. I believe Miami, which is not nearly as large as Philadelphia from the standpoint of population, operates its airport at a profit.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I am sure the Senator from Kentucky anticipated a quick rebuttal of my statement in that connection. Next to New York, Los Angeles, Chicago, and perhaps one or two other airports, the Miami Airport handles a far greater volume of traffic than the airport in Philadelphia, which is only a stop between Washington and New York, so far as aviation is concerned.

It is true that during the past few years we have increased our status among national airports from 35th to 18th. But we are in no position to compete with the airports at the terminal points of our country, such as Miami. If we were to look into the Miami situation we might find some things which my friend from Kentucky quite wisely did not bring out.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I yield.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator from Pennsylvania modestly referred to the great city of Philadelphia, and its historic tradition and importance in the culture and civilization of America. I think it is a city of great importance. I have never known more charming people anywhere in the world than those from Philadelphia. I commend the Senator from Pennsylvania for coming to Kentucky, and to my home town, to find his very charming and gracious wife.

Mr. CLARK. I thank the Senator.

Mr. COTTON obtained the floor.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COTTON. I yield.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to suggest the absence of a quorum, without the Senator from New Hampshire losing his right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield for that purpose?

Mr. COTTON. I yield for that purpose, provided I do not thereby lose the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MORTON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRUENING in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, we are flat up against a vote on a half billion dollar program of paving runways and building terminals on every airport from Key West to Ketchikan. An airport program is vital and necessary because in a measure it spells out the future of the regions, the communities, the businesses, and the families of America.

Whatever may have been the disagreement in the committee or in the subcommittee, the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY] was entirely correct in saying that there is not a single member of the committee, Democrat or Republican, who is not extremely desirous of seeing to it that the airport program of America should not be choked, scuttled, or stifled in any manner, shape, or form.

Because our decision today involves a vitally important program and at the same time has a terrific impact, actual and psychological, upon the budget, it calls for careful scrutiny and precision thinking.

First, let us ask this question: What do we want?

We want a continuing airport program. We want aid available wherever it is actually needed and can be matched for the essentials of airports. We want it available for the small communities as well as the large.

We want the dollars spent wisely and frugally.

We want them spent for essentials and not for frills and furbelows.

We want them spent for expanding future needs and not for passing fancies.

And above all, we want safety first—ahead of comfort and convenience.

We may well ask this question also: What is it we do not want?

We do not want any community needing to develop its airport and ready to match the Federal funds turned away and its future development imperiled. We do not want to provide Federal funds so lavishly that we offer inducements for impractical and uneconomic uses. We do not want to encourage—and mark this, Mr. President—the building of bigger, heavier, faster commercial aircraft to the point that endless runways are required far beyond the resources of our smaller cities and communities. We do not want Federal money devoted to facilities that are self-liquidating and are used for profitable business concessions.

We do not want—and this too is vital—a ballooned up bill and a veto, and no Federal aid at all.

We want immediate, practicable, and reasonable aid for airports, not a political issue for 1960.

Therefore the first question before the Senate upon which I trust we shall vote shortly, in connection with the substitute offered by the distinguished Senator from Kansas, the ranking minority member of the committee, is whether an extension of the present law, with its $63 million a year for 4 years, is adequate for the airport needs of American communities, large and small, or whether we should boost the Federal contribution to $465 million for that period, with $165 million immediately available.

That is the very crux of this question. That is where we stand or fall. That is the decision which every one of us must make in deciding this critical vote on the substitute.

The first answer is that under the present law, which has stood the test of time, the funds have proved to be adequate for the needs of the airports of this country up to the present moment, and beyond.

There is a good deal of confusion in the minds of some Senators—and I know some confusion existed in my own mind during the first part of the hearings—with respect to the status of funds under this program. We talk about expenditures and about obligations or contracts for future spending, and then the Agency—and this has been somewhat confusing—talks about funds which are programed. Let me first mention the expenditures which are the least significant. With $64 million available in fiscal year 1956, only $16.5 million was spent; in 1957, only $20.7 million; in 1958, $42 million; in 1959 expenditures are estimated at about $50 million and for fiscal 1960, $54½ million is the estimate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I am informed by the chairman of the subcommittee and by the acting minority leader that it is agreeable to have a unanimous-consent agreement entered into. I should like to propose such an agreement if the Senator will yield to me for that purpose, with the understanding that he will not lose the floor and with the further understanding that the agreement will not go into effect until the Senator has concluded his statement.

Mr. COTTON. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I thank the Senator from New Hampshire for his uniform courtesy.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the address by the Senator from New Hampshire 30 minutes be allotted on each amendment, the time to be equally divided between the proponent of the amendment and the majority leader; and that 30 minutes be allotted on the bill, the time to be divided between the majority leader and the minority leader.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRUENING in the chair). Is there objection?

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—and I am sorry to do so in view of the majority leader's courtesy to me—I trust the amendment will be voted on shortly; but there is one more amendment which will be offered on our side; namely, the amendment to eliminate terminal buildings or those facilities in such buildings not used for operational purposes. It is an extremely critical amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Does the Senator desire more time on that amendment?

Mr. COTTON. I know of perhaps three Senators who wish to be heard on it. I wish the distinguished majority leader would agree to letting us have a little more time on that amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I will agree to whatever the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire suggests. That is how I feel about his judgment. Would an hour suit the Senator?

Mr. COTTON. I think an hour would be adequate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. To be equally divided? If all the time is not used, it can be yielded back.

Mr. COTTON. I wish the Senator would agree to making the time an hour and a half.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I modify my request so as to provide, on the airport terminal amendment, an hour and a half, the time to be equally divided; on the other amendments, 30 minutes for each amendment, the time to be equally divided; and on the passage of the bill, 30 minutes, the time to be equally divided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, when I yielded for the unanimous-consent proposal, I was speaking about what seems to be the very essence of the problems, the contest, the controversy over this very important amendment and the adequacy of the funds. I hope every Senator will bear in mind these figures and facts covering the time the aid-for-airports program has been in effect, and I have just said that the cash expenditures are not significant. In no year has the agency administering the program been able to come anywhere near legally obligating all the funds at its disposal. In no year—and this includes the estimates for the present fiscal year, 1959, and the coming fiscal year, 1960—has all of the money available been completely programed.

When, as in the colloquy in which the able Senator from Pennsylvania participated, a Senator says, "I have looked at the records of my State, and they show we had to use up to the limit of every cent for this program," what does that mean? I think if he looks more closely at the figures, he will discover that it only means his State programed up to only the limit of its allotment.

In other words, suppose a community says it will need $100,000 of Federal funds. It wants to lengthen its runways and do thus and so. The agency examines the requirements proposed, approves them, and enters into what was referred to in the testimony before our committee as a gentlemen's agreement to earmark the necessary money to take care of the program, pending the time when the State is able to raise its matching funds by bond issues or other means. Then when a contract was entered into, the amount involved becomes an obligation.

I shall not go into details, but in every single year—and the records are absolutely indisputable—the agency has never been able to program, even informally, all the money at its disposal. Why? Because each year the communities have found that for various reasons they were unable at the time to match the Federal funds.

So they are obliged to wait and to defer the construction of their airports.

In many States, the money goes into the next year's apportionment. I will not say it reverts, because it has never been used or legally obligated.

So for fiscal 1957, we find that $18 million was not even programed; and a lot more money which was programed was deferred or never obligated and came back.

In fiscal 1958, almost $22 million was not even informally programed. In addition to that, more money was never obligated and came back.

In 1959, almost $16 million was never programed, and the estimate is that more money will never reach the obligation stage, and will come back.

When we entered fiscal 1959, the present fiscal year, almost $121 million was available for programing. That means $63 million of new money for fiscal 1959 plus the carryover funds.

So we entered the present fiscal year, the year in which we are living, the year about which we have heard so much as being in the jet age, with almost $121 million available for programing, yet it will not all be used.

It is very difficult for me to understand, and I think it is difficult for some of my colleagues to understand that we need to increase the amount in order not to turn away airports.

I suggest, Mr. President, that Congress is a continuing body. We shall be here next year, or our successors will be. The Senate will be here and the House will be here next year and the year after. We are constantly being told that we are blossoming and blooming and burgeoning into the great jet age. We have been entering it for several years now. If the communities of the country are not receiving sufficient support to develop their airports in the age in which they are living, there is no reason in the world why an addition cannot be made to the amount now proposed.

Every Senator is aware of the fact, as has been so ably stated on the floor, that we are confronted with an increasing budget and a shrinking dollar. We should all realize how fundamentally necessary it is to try to hold the line on expenditures.

I am sure there is not a single Senator on either side of the aisle who does not believe that if we err, we had better err on the side of economy rather than of prodigality.

Every Senator has the responsibility to consider carefully how he will vote. Everyone of us has a responsibility to the people of his State. I did not approve of the request of the administration. I did not approve of a proposal under which $65 million would be available in fiscal 1960, $55 million in fiscal 1961, $45 million in fiscal 1962, and $35 million in fiscal 1963.

I could not go back home and justify such a proposal of orderly withdrawal, and I am certain other Senators feel the same way. I, as a Republican, take just as much exception to that as does any Member on the other side of the aisle.

But, conversely, I wish to say to the Members of the Senate—and we have been through this in the committee—that not one Member of the Senate need hesitate for a moment to vote to continue the present program of $63 million a year. Why? First, because we never yet have exceeded it; we never yet have used all of the funds it provided. There is not one shred or scintilla of evidence that it is not enough; and there is the evidence of experience that it is enough. Second, because if it does not prove adequate for next year, when combined with what we expect to carry over from this year, there will be nothing in the world to prevent its being supplemented at that time.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Hampshire yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRUENING in the chair). Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. COTTON. I am happy to yield to the distinguished Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The Senator from New Hampshire mentioned some figures which show that for a certain year, $123 million is available, being composed of $60 million which was carried over because it was not expended, and $63 million which was available as the allocation for that year. What year is that; and will the Senator elucidate on that point?

Mr. COTTON. I said that as we entered the present fiscal year of 1959, which began on July 1, 1958, of course, immediately there was available the new money in the amount of $63 million. In addition, there was available carryover money in the amount of $57,880,000. So the total available for programing and for obligation on this program, as we entered the present fiscal year, was $120,880,000; that was the amount available for the very year in which we are now doing business.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Did I correctly understand the Senator from New Hampshire to say that in practically each of the last 3 or 4 years there was an unexpended balance from the amount allocated?

Mr. COTTON. In every one of the last years; there has not been a year since this program began when there has not been, first, a large unexpended balance of actual appropriations, although that is not so significant; second, a very substantial carryover of funds which were not legally obligated; and, third, a certain carryover of funds not even informally programed. That was the case in every year—in the fiscal year 1956, in the fiscal year 1957, in the fiscal year 1958; and it is what is projected for both the fiscal year 1959 and the fiscal year 1960, under the present program, as a result of the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. LAUSCHE. What does the record show with regard to the prospects for the size of the fund at the end of the fiscal year 1959?

Mr. COTTON. The forecast or the estimate is that at the end of the fiscal year 1959 as we enter the fiscal year 1960, there will be a carryover, unobligated, of just under $58 million; that of the $58 million, approximately $17 million will not have been obligated and at least $11 million—will be unobligated, unprogramed, and will carry over, and in addition to the $63 million—will be unobligated, and will not even be informally programed—all of which, I say to my friend, the Senator from Ohio, is the reason why, when this matter came before the committee, the able and distinguished Senator from Oklahoma, with his usual fairness, immediately reduced the provision of his original bill which called for $75 million of discretionary funds, to $65 million, because it was incontrovertibly shown to every member of the committee, and every member of the committee immediately realized, that at least $11 million which was available had not been spent, was uncommitted, and was not even programed.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Did the committee receive any testimony which showed that, as a result of available money unobligated, uncommitted, and unspent, there had been defaults because the local taxpayers refused to approve bond issues for the construction of the airports?

Mr. COTTON. The evidence from the agencies was that, over the years, experience had shown—well, I would not use the word "defaults," and I am sure the senior Senator from Ohio would not mean to use that word, either; the fact simply was that after they had requested the money, and had shown their needs, they were unable to meet them; that, therefore, the money was not used; and that an average of 17 percent of all the funds informally programed was not used.

So, several times, Senators have said—and I understand quite clearly why they have said it—"you gentlemen are saying that the present program is ample. Yet I know of airports that have wanted and needed additional funds, but have received from the agency letters in which they have been told that all the funds have been programed."

Well, as a matter of fact, not all the funds have been programed; but there have been periods when nearly all the funds, nearly up to the limit, had been informally promised. But in each case, within a few months many communities found that they could not meet the matching requirement, and therefore some of the funds were returned.

That is why I say in all recent years the money for this program has been not only sufficient, but more than sufficient, to take care of the airport needs of the Nation.

Mr. LAUSCHE. It may be that later the Senator from New Hampshire will discuss this item further. If he will, then he need not answer the question I wish to ask now. But if not, I should like to have him explain in greater detail his views about the impropriety of having the taxpayers of the Nation finance the building of these terminals, warehouses, and similar accommodations.

Mr. COTTON. I shall come to that point in a moment, and shall discuss it only briefly, because I feel that perhaps I am trespassing a little bit upon the courtesy extended to me—inasmuch as I have been exempted from the provisions of the unanimous-consent agreement. Certainly I do not want to abuse the privilege I have received.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Hampshire yield to me?

Mr. COTTON. I yield.

Mr. CARLSON. The distinguished Senator from New Hampshire has discussed the carryover from year to year. I should like to ask whether the pending bill, as reported by the committee, or the amendment in the nature of a substitute, which now is at the desk, makes any changes in the carryovers from year to year, as compared with those in the past?

Mr. COTTON. Yes; there is a difference; and I thank the Senator from Kansas for bringing this point to my attention.

The pending committee bill contains an amendment on this subject which was agreed to by all members of the committee; and because it was agreed to by all of us, I am certain that if the motion of the distinguished senior Senator from Kansas prevails, and if the present program is adopted, the amendment also will be agreed to.

I have been talking about funds which have been tied up by informal agreement. Once funds have been obligated to a certain airport or to a certain State, they remain tied up for 2 years under the present law. At the expiration of the 2-year period, if the community for which those funds were tied up is unable to avail itself of the funds, the funds revert and are reallocated. That money goes back into the fund, 75 percent of which is allocated to States, and 25 percent of which can be assigned at the discretion of the agency.

I think we were completely unanimous in committee in the belief that the arrangement could be improved; that we could make this money more flexible, and make it possible for less money to go farther and be more effective for the airports of this country. I am not talking about the special $65 million fund the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY] provides in his bill, but I mean the restrictions on those funds which have been allocated, and after the expiration of 2 years, are not used. The committee bill and the substitute both provide that these funds come back to the discretionary fund, so they could be used at the points where the agency finds they are most needed, and where the communities would most likely avail themselves of the funds. We would thus provide flexibility and elasticity, which is as good as a lot of extra money, because it means the funds can be used in those sections which can raise their part of the fund.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COTTON. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ALLOTT. I should like to ask two questions of the Senator from New Hampshire. First of all, the Senator from New Hampshire has used the word "programing." For the sake of the RECORD, so what he is talking about will be clear, will the Senator from New Hampshire give a definition of the term "programing"? By that term he is describing the programs of various municipalities——

Mr. COTTON. I believe the Senator from Colorado just came into the Chamber. I had just completed explaining that the term "programing" meant when an airport or a community asked for money, showed its needs, and the agency approved the request and set aside funds by a gentleman's agreement, without any obligation being involved. The community would be told that the fund would be held aside for it and, "We will see what you do about raising your money." Obligating funds means reaching the point where the community or airport raises the money and is about ready to enter into a contract. When I use the term "programing" I am talking about funds which are not legally tied up. I felt we should go the whole way, and not present our side of the picture too favorably, and that I should refer only to programing where that term was applicable.

Mr. ALLOTT. I thank the Senator for his explanation. Awhile ago, the Senator used the figure of $11 million as the amount which would be left at the end of fiscal year 1959. Does that figure include programed projects?

Mr. COTTON. No; it does not include even programed projects. At the end of 1959 it is expected that $57.8 million will be carried over. Part of the funds will be obligated and part of them will be only programed. But the surplus of $11 million is money that will be absolutely free and clear, and not be involved in even a gentleman's agreement or an informal promise to anybody.

Mr. ALLOTT. And, as experience has shown, at that time undoubtedly there will be at least a substantial portion of money which will not be taken up or met by the cities or communities. The Senator referred to 17 percent. That amount, of course, will be added to the $11 million, will it?

Mr. COTTON. That amount may be added to the $11 million, depending on the accuracy of current estimates.

According to the testimony, as I remember it, and I want to be very conservative about this, a matter of $57 million is involved, but that amount is inclusive of the $11 million. The figure is made up of the $11 million plus $46 million, which is not obligated, but is programed; that amount would come back into the fund. It would not be held any longer. $11 million would be available without any strings attached at all.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COTTON. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. KEATING. I should like to follow up the colloquy held between the Senator from Colorado and the Senator from New Hampshire. With reference to the funds to which the Senator from New Hampshire has referred as coming back, do I understand from him that the funds would become available to those States or those communities which have elected to match the funds, added to what may have been previously allocated to those States or communities?

Mr. COTTON. I have been referring to carryovers. I am not quite sure I understand the Senator's question. At the end of each year there are funds which have been obligated legally and are going to be spent. We do not even call those funds carryovers. They are not included in what I have stated at all.

In addition, at the end of each year there are considerable amounts which have been programed and as to which there have been informal agreements and promises. We count those as carryovers. In other words, the carryover as predicted from fiscal 1955 entering fiscal 1960 would be $57 million of unobligated—never legally obligated—funds, to be added to the $63 million, if the present program continues. But of that $57 million, $46 million would have been informally programed and held out as a hope for various communities to use. Some of that money would be free. Some of it would be released from obligations because communities could not meet those funds. So there would be varying degrees of obligations and promises.

Mr. KEATING. But in the proposed program, at the end of 2 years, in addition to the funds authorized in the pending measure, there will be what the Senator has spoken of as $57 million and all of the other $11 million which will become available, in the discretion of the Administrator, to other communities that are ready and able to match the funds?

Mr. COTTON. That is correct. In addition, in this case the obligated funds are to come back. They are held for 2 years, but, obviously, at the end of each year some of the funds will come back. They will come back to the discretionary fund, 100 percent, and thus be available. In the past those funds have been tied up, because they would be allocated to certain States which might never use its quota. Now the funds can be used in a community which can avail itself of them.

Mr. KEATING. Will that arrangement be provided in the substitute proposed to be offered for S. 1?

Mr. COTTON. That is agreed by all of us. It is to be incorporated in the substitute.

Mr. BENNETT and Mr. BUTLER addressed the Chair.

Mr. COTTON. I think the Senator from Utah was on his feet first. I shall yield to him for 1 minute, and then to the Senator from Maryland for 1 minute. Then I shall conclude.

Mr. BENNETT. I appreciate the opportunity to question the Senator. I shall be very brief, so that my colleague from Maryland will have a little time.

Utah is one of the States with respect to which during the last 4 years there have been 2 years in which unobligated funds remained. In other words, funds were turned back because the funds made available were not actually used.

I should like to ask the Senator if during the hearings there was presented any evidence that the people of the State of Utah, or the communities or other government agencies of the State of Utah, indicated the situation is changing and that they are now anxious to get money which in the past they were unwilling to use, and turned back?

Mr. COTTON. I am not aware of any such evidence. I was present at all of the hearings and I am unaware of such evidence. If any such evidence was presented it was not presented in open hearing.

Mr. BENNETT. I ask the question in this peculiar way because during all of the time since the matter came up, since the beginning of Congress and all during the hearings, not one single communication has come to my office in support of this bill, or asking for extra funds.

Mr. COTTON. That is true in my own case, and in the cases of many others. As a matter of fact, I will say to the Senator from Utah that in my own State the funds which we have by allocation would not extend one runway from 3,500 feet to 5,000 feet. We are dependent upon discretionary funds if we are to do that.

We have had allocated to us $360,000 of Federal money, discretionary funds, for a $720,000 job, to extend the runway of a vital airport which is a link in the through traffic. Unfortunately, the legislature and the communities have not yet been able to match the funds. We are assured it will continue to be available for us if we can match it under either one of these bills. I am sure the same is true with respect to the airports in the fine State of Utah.

Mr. BENNETT. Apparently the people of Utah are not concerned about either one of the bills, because the Senator from Utah has not received a single communication in this regard.

Mr. COTTON. What the people in most States are concerned about is finding the money to match the funds. We can balloon this program up and provide a billion dollars, but the people cannot use it so long as they have to provide 50 percent to match the funds. That is what worries the folks back home.

A lot of airport authorities come in to plead for the Monroney bill, and say, "Give us more money, and show us great plans for those airports." But as a matter of fact, from the crossroads and grassroots, from the small communities of this country, I have not had a letter or an appeal. I say to my friend from Utah, I will almost guarantee the thing which concerns the people of Utah is the same thing which concerns the people of New Hampshire. We know the Federal money is there. Where are we going to get the money to match it?

Mr. BENNETT. I say to my friend from New Hampshire that I have not received a single communication from an airport authority. I have not had a single communication from the State of Utah in support of the bill.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COTTON. I yield.

Mr. MONRONEY. Does the Senator not think that fact speaks well for the proponents of the bill, since they did not urge a flood of mail be sent to Senators, as most proponents usually do, to clutter up the Senators' desks?

Mr. BENNETT. If I may respond to the Senator, if the success of the bill depends upon the mail which originates from the proponents of the bill, instead of from the folks back home, then I think the bill stands on a very weak foundation. The fact that the folks back home at their own initiative have completely ignored the bill is very convincing to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, I shall finish quickly now, because I have taken a great deal of time answering the very welcome questions of Senators.

Mr. President, we are about to vote upon this matter. I think we have sufficiently emphasized the fact that with respect to experience, the test of time, the substitute will be sufficient for the needs of the airports of this country. Extending the law, Mr. President, is going beyond what the administration wants, but it is in keeping with what we on the minority side of the committee, as well as at least one distinguished member on the other side, feel is fair, just, frugal, and safe. By taking such action, we will not break the line on the budget in fiscal year 1960, which would have a tremendous psychological effect.

In the second place, I want to hastily mention something which was pretty well covered, but which was disputed a few minutes ago. I think the reason it was disputed is that Senators forgot they were talking about programed funds, informally promised funds, rather than legally obligated funds. That is a reference to the $1,290,000,000. Hastily, the FAA asked the operators of 3,000 airports in this country to write down their needs, and they wrote down their needs. I think human nature is such that they did not minimize the needs. Then the entire figure was put together.

Mr. President, that is not a survey; that is a grab bag.

If there has been a question raised now by various Senators on that point, it has been raised, I think, because the informal programing was being confused with obligations. It is an absolute fact from experience that in no one year have more than 600 airports in this country ever even applied for funds.

I invite attention to the fact that we put Federal money into airports of communities with less than 1,000 people. Over the past 4 years we have spent $2.6 million for airports which are used by less than 10 planes. The Federal aid averaged $11,700 per plane, and more, in most instances, than the planes are worth.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COTTON. I yield.

Mr. BUTLER. Is it not also true that within the estimates are figures which exceed the limitation of $1 million which could be granted? Therefore, those amounts could not be granted under the program at all.

Mr. COTTON. The Senator is correct. It is the policy under the program not to grant more than $1 million a year for any one of the larger airports in this country. Much of the $1,290 million is an estimate of money which could not be granted under either bill.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. COTTON. I desire to serve notice, Mr. President, in the moment or two left to me, that after we have voted on the vital question covered by the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Kansas, I shall offer an amendment which has as its purpose the restricting of the Federal money for airport aid, and excluding from the aid all terminal buildings and structures which are not devoted to control towers, to weather agencies, and other vital operations necessary to the safety of the airport.

I will say at this time, in one brief moment before I close, I invite the attention of Senators to a couple of interesting facts. The New York Port Authority received $125,000 last year from one advertising agency for the privilege of placing signs in the terminals at La Guardia, Idlewild, and Newark. The authority received $1,200 a month from one automobile company for the privilege of letting one automobile model sit in the lobby.

The Washington National Airport received $182,000 last year from the insurance companies for the concessions which they have in the Washington terminal.

The Miami International Airport made a net profit of more than $2½ million in 1957—and more power to them.

The Los Angeles Airport made a profit of more than $2 million last year; and we can take off our hats to them. That is good business.

The Greater Pittsburgh Airport made a profit of more than $300,000 in 1957.

The airport at Louisville, Ky., made a profit of more than $100,000 in 1957.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COTTON. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Does the figure for Pittsburgh include debt charges and depreciation, or is it merely a statement of cash balance?

Mr. COTTON. It is based upon receipts and expenditures.

Mr. CLARK. Therefore it does not include either debt charges or depreciation. I think the Senator should be frank enough to say so.

Mr. COTTON. I believe that is true. It does not include Federal aid, either.

Mr. CLARK. My good friend from New Hampshire is one of the best fiscal experts in the Senate, and he knows normal accounting procedures better than almost any other Member of this body. He knows that when he reads into the RECORD that the Greater Pittsburgh Airport made a profit of more than $300,000 in 1957, before depreciation or debt charges, that is not exactly a fair statement.

Mr. COTTON. The information which the Senator from New Hampshire had with respect to the Greater Pittsburgh Airport was as follows: Revenues, $2,156,986; expenses, $1,818,584; net income, $338,396; concession income, $1,038,474.

Those are the figures that were furnished me.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator is correct in what he said; what he told was the truth; but I am suggesting that the whole truth has now been brought out by our colloquy.

Mr. COTTON. If the Senator suggests that the Senator from New Hampshire was willfully withholding any factors, the Senator is mistaken. I welcome any correction which the Senator from Pennsylvania can make.

Mr. CLARK. Of course, my friend knows that I know him well enough never to attribute any such motive to him. However, I do think it is important to talk in terms of real profit, and not merely cash receipts.

Mr. COTTON. Let me mention a little item which is not profit. We received testimony to the effect that it was the duty of the Federal Government not only to keep passengers safe, but to keep them dry, and that certain facilities of an airport are just as necessary as the runways. From one standpoint, that is undoubtedly true. Therefore, I mention something which surprised me when I learned it.

Sanitary facilities are undoubtedly essential to the welfare of the traveling public; but they, too, are money-making facilities at most airports.

The San Francisco International Airport produced revenues of $16,000 in 1957, from its restrooms. I understand that that figure does not take into consideration funded indebtedness and depreciation. [Laughter.]

The aggregate rents and landing charges paid by airplanes to airports throughout the country in 1957 are estimated at $24 million. I do not question the money invested in the great airline terminals. Like almost every other American, I am proud of those terminals. I do not suggest that they are already paid for, but I suggest that they are revenue-producing, money-making institutions. At a time when we are fighting desperately with a hairline budget, at a time when we are devoting all the financial sinews of the country to the national defense, at a time when we are spending, or will spend in the next 4 years, more than $1,200 million to try to make the airways safe for the men, women, and children who travel them, if any Senator can give one logical, valid reason why we should contribute a single red cent to terminal facilities, aside from those necessary in the operation of the airport, I should like to hear the reason.

For that reason I shall offer later, and welcome support for, an amendment which would eliminate that feature from the bill. If it is eliminated from the bill, the saving will be between 25 and 33⅓ percent—between one-fourth and a third of all the Federal funds we need to put into airports; and we shall be able to hold the line on the budget and earmark the money for the most vital needs. I shall discuss that subject later.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COTTON. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. First, let me say that I appreciate the full handling which the Senator has given in his discussion of his amendment.

I have procured, from the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures a compilation which I think might be helpful at this time. I shall cite it, and ask leave to have it printed in the RECORD if that meets with the approval of the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire.

This compilation shows, in two groupings, the appropriations of the Congress over the past 6 years, and those covered by the budget for fiscal year 1960.

The principal matter shown is a complete refutation of the understanding so many citizens seem to have, that during this period of time it is our defense and foreign relations expenditures which have gone up so heavily. That is simply not the case.

For example, this compilation shows that all the national security and foreign aid, including both military assistance and economic and other assistance, and international affairs, called for Federal expenditures of $48,636 million, in 1954, whereas in 1959 those same grouping called for Federal expenditures of $49,828 million, or a very small increase.

As contrasted with that, this compilation shows that in the field of domestic civilian expenditures, the expenditures of our Government have gone up, since 1954, from a total of $19,136 million to $33,955 million in the current year, 1959, or an increase of 71 percent, indicating that if there is any opportunity for saving and budget balancing, it lies in the direction of stopping the trend toward continuous increases of expenditures for domestic civilian activities.

The increase in that bracket of expenditure during the past 6 years was 71 percent. In other words, the expenditures by our Government in the domestic civilian fields in 1959, the year which is now coming to a close, were 71 percent larger than the expenditures in those same fields for 1954.

Mr. COTTON. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent—if it meets with the approval of the Senator from New Hampshire—that this compilation, coming from the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures, and based entirely upon U.S. budget documents, be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

Mr. COTTON. I join in the request that the table be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Commerce and housing figures and affected totals above are adjusted to include these figures throughout for complete and accurate comparison over the period. For this reason the President's budget shows total expenditures estimated at $77 billion for fiscal year 1960 and the attached table shows $80.7 billion. The $3.7 billion difference is entirely in FNMA and highway expenditures—$485 million for FNMA and $3.1 billion for highways.

Mr. HOLLAND. I should like to bring out also at this time a fact which has already been touched upon by the distinguished Senator, namely, that our appropriations for aviation activities have become huge, and are growing greater. Our responsibilities in that field are continuing to increase, particularly in the field of installation of facilities and of operation and maintenance of such facilities.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be included in the RECORD at this point the compilation which appears at page 258 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 9 of this year. The compilation appears in the first column at the top of that page. It shows the appropriations and other authorizations for civil aviation activities from 1950 to 1959.

Mr. COTTON. I agree that that compilation should be inserted in the RECORD. I wish to thank the distinguished Senator from Florida. We all know that, as chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations handling appropriations for air safety, he speaks with great authority on this subject. His remarks are most significant, and the facts he produces add much to the potency of the position we take in this matter.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Appropriations and other authorizations for civil aviation activities (1950–59)

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank my distinguished friend from New Hampshire. I should like to make a comment with reference to the compilation which I have last placed in the RECORD. It shows, as compared with very minor contributions for facility installations in the earlier years—for instance in 1952, only $7.1 million; in 1953, only $8.4 million; in 1954, only $5 million; in 1955, only $3.2 million—that in the last 2 years huge expenditures have been made in the field of rendering safe travel in the airlanes: $124.6 million in 1958, and $158.5 million in this pending year 1959. Those expenditures have been made, with the program only well begun, and calling for the expenditure of vastly increased sums in the next 2 or 3 years.

I should also like to call attention to the fact that with these increased facilities, the operation and maintenance of those facilities have increased and required a materially increased Federal expenditure.

For instance, in 1952, that appropriation was only $112.6 million, whereas in 1958, it was $181.7 million—this is for the operation and maintenance of the facilities which are supposed to make the airlanes safe for traffic, although they have not reached the stage where they have accomplished that fact as we desire it to be accomplished—and in 1959 the appropriation was $241.7 million, for the operation and maintenance of safety flying facilities.

It seems to the Senator from Florida that since our responsibility is so completely exclusive in that field, because there is no other agency, except a Federal one, which could handle that operation, and because the safety of our civilian flyers and travelers accompanies the safety of our military flyers and travelers in the same airlanes, being subject to the same directional facilities and control facilities, there is every justification for these heavy expenditures—and they will be heavier in the next year and in the immediate future—for the maintenance of safe traveling conditions in the air of this Nation. Therefore, when we come to the matter of airports, except for those facilities of the airport which dovetail with the question of safety and the question of direction and the question of control from the control tower, and similar matters, it seems to me that the local communities should not require or expect the Federal Government to increase the scale of the grants, which have been quite generous and which I think will remain generous.

I apologize to the distinguished Senator for interrupting him. However I wanted to place these tables in the RECORD, along with the brief comment I have made.

Mr. COTTON. The Senator from New Hampshire is very grateful to the Senator from Florida for his contribution.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COTTON. I am happy to yield to my distinguished senior colleague.

Mr. BRIDGES. I wish to compliment my colleague in the Senate upon his very able presentation. He has done an outstanding job as the ranking minority member of the Aviation Subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. I know of the hard work he has put into the framing of the bill. I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. COTTON. I thank the Senator for his compliment. I am grateful to him.

Mr. BRIDGES. How does the Senator interpret or evaluate the amendment which he is offering and the presentation he has made, from the standpoint of their application to our own State of New Hampshire?

Mr. COTTON. I am glad the Senator has asked me that question. The State of New Hampshire, like every small State with limited population areas, must depend on the discretionary fund for whatever aid it can get for its airports.

Under the committee bill the State would receive a larger amount in fiscal 1960. It would amount to something like $230,000 in the fiscal year 1960. That amount would not even extend one runway. Under the present law we would get something like $150,000. In each case, however, we can get the money from the discretionary fund. We have had one project for $720,000, which is more than the whole State allocation, and thus far, unfortunately, we have not been able to meet the allocation. Other projects have been met.

However, under either bill the State of New Hampshire, like other small States, must depend upon the discretionary fund. Our experience indicates that under either formula we would be able to obtain in the years ahead all the money that we can afford to meet and match. I know that the distinguished senior Senator from New Hampshire, who was a great Governor of our State and who knows much of our fiscal situation, will agree with me when I make the statement that we can get enough money under either bill.

Mr. BRIDGES. Under the so-called outside-the-gate amendment, will there be sufficient funds to cover the necessities of aviation in our State?

Mr. COTTON. Yes. I am tempted to say that there have been a great many crocodile tears shed, but to use that term might sound sarcastic, and I do not want to be sarcastic. But there were a great many tears shed in committee and during the course of the debate about tar paper shacks and inadequate facilities. I know that the Senator agrees with me that the State of New Hampshire can get money to lengthen our runways—not for jet planes, but for other planes, other than DS–3's—and to take care of our needs in view of our diminishing railway service, if we can get the runways and the control towers and the safety devices and the planes. If we can get those things, the people of the State will be more than willing to take care of the terminal buildings and waiting rooms, and so forth.

We may not be able to provide plush accommodations or luxuries, or imposing accommodations, as are provided in some other places in the country, but we will keep the passengers dry. I am sure the Senator will agree.

Mr. BRIDGES. I agree.

DESTRUCTION OF UNARMED U.S. TRANSPORT PLANE OVER SOVIET ARMENIA

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, on January 17, 1959, I rose in the Senate to deplore the red-carpet treatment accorded Deputy Premier Mikoyan by some of our industrialists and Wall Street bankers. I also decried the action of some of my senatorial colleagues who had seen fit to honor and to lunch with Mikoyan under the very dome of the U.S. Capitol, that citadel of freedom and beacon light to the free world. I stood almost alone on the floor that day in upholding my position, but I was not disturbed, because I knew full well that it would eventually be justified.

At that time I did not realize how soon my stand would be vindicated. Today's shocking and incontrovertible revelation by our State Department should be proof enough to anyone that Soviet duplicity and ruthlessness are still the order of the day, and that Mikoyan's visit was one more cheap Soviet ruse. My patriotic blood was never more stirred than when I heard the tape recording of the Russian "duck shoot," over Armenia, of our unarmed transport plane. Feeling as I do myself, the feelings of the mothers, fathers, wives, children, and friends of our airmen must be indescribable.

In my Senate speech, I noted that 6 bodies of the 17 men aboard had been returned to us, and I called upon Mikoyan for an accounting of the other 11. Mikoyan was also questioned by our State Department. In the light of the disclosed evidence, Mikoyan's replies that "the plane had crashed" and that "the Soviet Government had given all the information it had," only reveals continuing Soviet perfidy of the highest order.

I could only wish that all who feted Mikoyan and all who thought the Russians could now be trusted in negotiation should have continually dinned in their ears the tape recording of this act of murder which was applauded by Soviet commanding officers and high officials.

PRESIDENT EISENHOWER'S HOBBIES

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, a recently published book bearing the arresting title of "U.S.A.—Second Class Power?" has just reached my desk. The book was coauthored by Drew Pearson and Jack Anderson.

The book itself might be described as a somewhat laundered version of "Washington Confidential." It purports to be a penetrating analysis of America's present defense posture. The flyleaf states that the book "is the shocking story of how we have let ourselves fall behind scientifically and militarily in the age of satellites and missiles."

Aside from being in some respects a maltreatment of some phases of history, the book contains certain trivia completely belying the seriousness of its title. Among other things, it seeks to impugn the President's abilities as an artist.

In this regard, the authors state on page 133 of the book:

> He can lose himself completely in his art, though his portraits of Lincoln and Washington, copies of which he presented to friends as Christmas gifts, were actually sketched by a professional artist; Ike simply added the coloring.

Mr. President, this is a free country, and anybody can write, say, or think what he likes. But it seems to me that as long as the authors self-servingly claim to have written a book fraught with import for all Americans, they should have endeavored to confine it to matters of primary concern on the economic and military front rather than to descend to unsupported allegations that someone else does the sketching for the President's paintings.

Any commentator or columnist is free to comment on or to criticize a U.S. Senator, Representative, Governor, or any other public official—including the President—on official acts, statements, or votes. I certainly have no quarrel with that basic freedom.

Those who enjoy freedom of speech also bear a responsibilty of propriety in the exercise of it, particularly those who are professional writers. The attempted snide remarks in regard to one of the President's hobbies, in the course of a purportedly serious review of our defense posture, is certainly hitting below the belt and is in poor taste.

In view of the fact that the President of the United States has one of the toughest jobs on the face of the earth, any fair-minded person should not begrudge or deny him the obvious relaxation he derives from his painting. Many outstanding men in public and private life have found relaxation in the hobby of painting, including another great contemporary statesman of our era, Sir Winston Churchill.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. COTTON. I commend the distinguished Senator for his forthright and positive statements. I am happy to be associated with him.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL AIRPORT ACT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1) to amend the Federal Airport Act in order to extend the time for making grants under the provisions of such act, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRUENING in the chair). The debate on the pending amendment will be limited to 30 minutes the time to be equally divided between the Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL] and the majority leader.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, in behalf of the majority leader, I yield 10 minutes on the bill to the distinguished Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, in order effectively to determine the degree of Federal participation in the development of our airports during the next 4 or 5 years, it might be well to review briefly a little past history. Since 1937 the taxpayers of America have spent more than $1½ billion in the form of on air navigation, safety aids, and air traffic control. In the last 20 years, so-called subsidy payments of nearly $830 million have been made to the air carriers of this country. Since 1933 more than $2½ billion in the form of cash or property has been contributed to the Nation's civil airports. I admit that some of these expenditures have been for the benefit of military aviation. Nevertheless, one can hardly charge that through the Federal Government the taxpayer has been niggardly or penny-pinching in his promotion of civil aeronautics.

As we approach this problem of the degree of Federal participation in future airport development, let us bear in mind that the taxpayer will be required to carry an ever-increasing burden in the field of full Federal responsibility, namely, air safety. Under the most conservative estimates, the bill for air safety will exceed $3 billion in the next 5 years. No one can possibly estimate it beyond that date with any degree of accuracy. It is safe to presume that by 1970 the cost of our air safety program, including the necessary aids to navigation and traffic control, will exceed $1 billion per annum. Everyone agrees that these are costs which must be borne by the Federal Government. There is no way of sharing this responsibility with State, county, or municipal governments. The entire cost will continue to fall on all of the people as Federal taxpayers.

I think that the Federal Airport Act must be continued. I think that there is today, and perhaps there always will be, a need for Federal assistance in the construction and future development of the Nation's airports. This is especially true in the case of those airports serving the medium and smaller-sized cities of the Nation. Many densely populated communities can construct and operate the required airport facilities with little or no help from Uncle Sam. I point to the great Idlewild Airport as an example.

The questions that concerned me are first, what is the immediate need? and second, what is the proper Federal share for meeting this need? We have been told time and again that the overall need is $1,300 million. This staggering amount of money, it is said, is necessary to provide the land, the buildings, the control towers, the lighting, the paving, and the like. If we are to modernize our airport system to meet the challenges of the jet age, I think it might be well to analyze briefly the source of these figures. As I understand it, the Federal Aviation Administration sent out an inquiry to those who control or operate some 3,000 airports, 1,000 of them being air commerce airports and about 2,000 general aviation airports. The replies were totaled and the $1,300 million figure resulted. These figures have not been analyzed or evaluated. They range from 200 million in California to 3 million in the State of Delaware. They cover the whole spectrum. They include everything from parking lots to cocktail bars.

I do not for a moment question the sincerity of those who control or operate our airports. I am sure that they responded to the questionnaires honestly and that they are convinced that their needs for the next 5 years are as set forth in these figures. I do believe, however, that there is a certain "letter-to-Santa-Claus" element in the total of $1.3 billion and I think it is quite understandable. If I got a letter asking me to list everything which I might need in the next 5 years, I think my reply would contain many items which I could get along without. Human nature being what it is, I don't think very much could have been overlooked by the airport operators when they filled out the forms. The greater the claimed need, the better the chance of getting Uncle Sam to "up the ante" and undertake a greater share of the burden.

Experience clearly points out that the need figures on which S. 1 relies are grossly inflated. Eighteen States failed to use the Federal airport funds allocated to them in the past. Their needs are included in this total figure. Have we any assurance that they will use the funds in the future? We know that many communities have rejected bond issues to provide airport facilities. We have no assurance that the citizens in those communities will change their minds. Yet the needs of these very airports are included in the figures put forward to justify the $465 million provided as Federal grant funds in S. 1. The figures include the total needs of the big metropolitan airports. Many of these are commercial successes and can, for the most part, finance their own requirements. In the past they have actually financed 75 percent of their requirements and the increased traffic of the past few years should sharply improve that general pattern.

I think a figure in the neighborhood of $250 million for Federal contribution in grant aid to airports is adequate for the next 4 years. This figure is not simply pulled out of the air. In each of the past 4 years, $63 million has been available. This totals $252 million. In not one of the past 4 years has this amount, plus the carryover, been obligated or even programed. But it is argued, "Oh, yes, but we are now in the jet age." Mr. President, I submit that the jet age did not catch us by surprise. One does not have to be an expert in aviation to know that the jet age has been coming for some time. I understand that my colleague the distinguished Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL] is to propose an amendment to continue the present act for 4 additional years. Such an amendment, if adopted, would provide $252 million, or $63 million a year. I intend to support this amendment. Should this amendment fail, I expect to offer amendments of my own to cut the monetary items in S. 1, the Monroney bill, as reported out of the committee. I am hopeful, however, that the Schoeppel amendment will be adopted. For that reason, I shall delay any detailed discussion of my own amendments until the Senate acts on the Schoeppel amendment.

I know that the argument has been made, and will be repeated, that the Government does not have to spend this money. I also know that many of those who make these arguments will be among the first to criticize General Quesada and his staff if he fails to program and obligate the available funds. When requests for Federal aid for projects of secondary priority or of doubtful necessity come to the Federal Aviation Administration, it will be hard to say "No" if funds are available. The Representative or the Senator concerned will, with his constituent, pound on the door, and will say, "We know there is plenty of money here. The obligation doesn't even have to go through the Appropriations Committee. Let us have it." If denied, the Representative or the Senator concerned will rise on the floor in wrathful indignation and will point out that the Federal Aviation Administration is being shortsighted, capricious, and irresponsible in denying funds for a marble-lined terminal building in dear old Chitlin' Switch.

All of us admire Pete Quesada. He was a tough flyer and a tough fighter. But even Pete, I am sure, would be the first to admit that it will be easier to stand up to the pressure and say "No" when the money available is sufficient only unto the needs. It is mighty hard to say "No" when two or three hundred million extra dollars are stashed away in the backroom.

I have no thought of liquidating or terminating this program. I want to see it continued. But I want to see that done within reason and with due regard to our fiscal responsibility as legislators in this great country.

I trust that the Senate will amend this bill so as to bring it within reason, and then will promptly pass it. We need the program; the present act is expiring. Unless we act reasonably and responsibly, we might well have no program at all. I trust that that will not happen.

Mr. President, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kansas yield 5 minutes to me?

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Maryland 5 minutes on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland is recognized for 5 minutes on the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I rise to support the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

Today, the Senate is considering the proposed expenditure of $465 million of the taxpayers' money. Yesterday we authorized $2.6 billion for housing. Furthermore, there will be many additional stresses and strains on the Federal budget, with the ensuing direct inflationary effect of deficit financing. This will inevitably weaken the purchasing power of the dollar the average American makes for his labors—the dollar the American housewife takes to the corner store or supermarket to purchase food and other necessities for her family. Thus, it is essential that the Senate review each new authorization and appropriation bill, to make certain that the funds of the American people will not be wasted, and that the fires of inflation will not be fanned by improvident or unnecessary expenditures.

In dealing specifically with the Federal airport problem, we have a dual responsibility to the thousands of American communities which will participate. First, it is vital that we provide adequate funds to carry out the legitimate responsibilities of the Federal Government. Second, it is also essential, especially during these days of increasing cost levels, that we protect the purchasing power of the millions of dollars of State and local matching funds which already have been raised and will be raised in the future.

The $465 million cost, as provided in Senate bill 1, in no way logically or reasonably reflects the cost of the program. This figure is a raw sum of the costs of items which 3,000 airport operators throughout the United States suggested they might or would like to undertake during the next 4-year period. The figure cannot be utilized as a direct measure for Federal matching funds.

This can readily be demonstrated: First, there is the $1 million a year limitation on Federal participation in any particular project: The proponents of Senate bill 1 do not object to this. The reason for this limitation is obvious; otherwise a substantial segment of the funds available might conceivably end up in a dozen or so of the projects for larger cities which, in connection with airport construction, have obligations which far exceed the responsibility of the Federal Government. Because of this limitation a large segment of the need which forms the basis of the figure contained in Senate bill 1 will never be translated into requests for matching funds. Second, administration of the present Federal-aid program has clearly shown that not all airport projects which are desired or suggested become realities. The reason is obvious. In many cases, because of present inflationary trends reflecting exorbitant Federal expenditures, local communities find it difficult or impossible to raise the funds necessary for their contributions. In other cases criteria or need factors change, and thus cause the local communities to abandon the projects before they even start. Third, the $465 million figure is based upon local projects, a great segment of which have not been studied from an engineering standpoint. Most of them also have not been correlated to the new air-control program which the Federal Government is undertaking at a cost of almost half a billion dollars a year. Furthermore—and this is really an oddity—because of limitations, such as are specifically provided in Senate bill 1, relating to terminal facilities, a substantial portion of the so-called need reflected in Senate bill 1 is disallowed from the very start. Thus, it is obvious that the $465 million authorization in Senate bill 1 is grossly unsound, and does not truly reflect the real amount of Federal matching funds necessary.

The proponents of Senate bill 1, in a sort of halfhearted admission, suggest that if this be true the administration need not spend the essential funds, and that, therefore, no damage is done. Well, Mr. President, let me suggest a few of the shortcomings in this procedure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time yielded to the Senator from Maryland has expired.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kansas please yield 1 additional minute to me?

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Maryland an additional minute and one-half.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland is recognized for an additional minute and one-half.

Mr. BUTLER. I thank the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. President, first, the actual enactment of a bill providing for unessential expenditure of Federal funds is inflationary in itself. Second, it ties up in this particular program funds which in future years might desperately be needed in other areas, such as defense, as well as in the many other programs considered essential to the welfare and future of our Nation. Third, such policies constitute an abdication of the Executive of legislative powers. Under this theory, we might as well authorize the Executive to build all the airports necessary throughout the country and to meet all other costs of Government, and to send us the bill. I must confess that it would appear that some of us would see nothing wrong in such a procedure. On my part, however, I would suggest that it is no way to run the fiscal affairs of Government.

In conclusion, I urge the Senate to take a very critical view of the cost items contained in Senate bill 1, and to reduce them to a legitimate and realistic level. I am convinced that the proposed authorization far exceeds the real need, and can, therefore, be substantially reduced without adversely affecting the Federal airport program.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum; and I ask unanimous consent that the time required therefor not be charged to the time available to either side under the unanimous-consent agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kansas repeat his request, please?

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I suggested the absence of a quorum; and I have requested that the time required therefor not be charged to the time available to either side under the provisions of the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Does the Senator from Kansas mean to have a quorum call just before the vote is taken—in other words, later on—or to have a quorum call at this time?

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. It was suggested that a quorum call be had at this time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Very well; I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kansas? Without objection, it is so ordered; and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the Schoeppel amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 minutes against the Schoeppel amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, no one appreciates more than I do the compliment paid us in the desire of the Republican members of our Aviation Subcommittee to extend the act of 1955 for 4 more years, because that is what it does. However, I feel that the bill which was sufficient and adequate when it was passed in the year 1955 is completely unrealistic today.

In the first place, let us consider the inflationary impact which is affecting construction costs; the heavier runways which are required, which necessitate a cost of $1,000 a foot for runway extension; the coming of the jet age, which requires 10,000-foot runways for jet airports. Also, as jet airplanes and other high performance aircraft come into use in hub airports, the Convairs, Viscounts, and DC–6's will go to the smaller airports and be used on secondary runs. Such airports will have to extend their runways from 3,500 feet to 7,500 feet.

Secondly, the provision for $63 million in matching funds is completely inadequate. It is not related to any realistic situation existing today. The Federal Aviation Agency made a finding of a need for $1,300,000,000. Airport operators and the municipal league made a finding of a need for $1,100,000,000. Otherwise there would be a failure in meeting the requests for matching funds within the $63 million which was made available.

After the $63 million were matched for the current fiscal year, there would still be $129 million worth of unsatisfied requests for projects which were ready for construction, but for which matching funds were not available.

The proposal looks backward. It not only looks back to 1955, but looks farther back then that, going back to 1946. In that year Congress authorized airport aid of $520 million for 7 years, to be appropriated for at not more than $100 million a year. That was in 1946. We have never used the $520 million authorized in 1946.

Let us look for a moment at the relationship of conditions now and at the time when Congress authorized that amount, in 1946. Since 1946 the total number of civil aircraft has increased from 10,000 to 67,153. Since 1946, the number of airborne passengers has quadrupled from $12 million to approximately $50 million a year. The speed of aircraft has increased to 550 miles an hour. The whole picture has completely changed.

We should not look back to 1946, or even to 1955. As I pointed out before, we are not the masters of this situation. We must have a national airport system which will fit the needs of civilian aircraft, commercial aviation, and military aviation, because they all use the airways. If we build too small, too little, or too late, we shall be doing a disservice to the people of the country.

Certainly I think the $100 million a year offered in the pending bill is logical. I think it fits, with a frugal design, the needs that will arise over the next 4 years. We have reduced the original request by $100 million, by cutting out the provisions for a fifth year, and we have reduced the discretionary fund by $10 million, which shows we are trying to arrive at the lowest dollar figure possible.

Let me point out one great fallacy in the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, which seeks to extend the old law for 4 years. S. 1, the bill the Senate is asked to vote on, provides for severe limitations against frills or unnecessary work on terminals. It limits expenditures to factors essential to health and safety. If the provision for terminals should be eliminated, I do not know why the Cotton amendment should not be joined with this one. Certainly, it seems to me the Republican attempt is to reduce the amount provided. But if the Schoeppel amendment is adopted and the Cotton amendment is killed, the door will be opened to widespread abuses in building terminals. Section 5 of the bill of the committee carefully prohibits the use of Federal funds for the construction of "bars, cocktail lounges, nightclubs, theaters, private clubs, garages, hotel rooms, commercial offices, or gamerooms, or such other use which, in the opinion of the Administrator, is not essential to the welfare and safety of those persons using airports for public aviation purposes."

One of the fallacies of the amendment of the Senator from Kansas is that such a restriction is not in his proposal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. MONRONEY. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 minutes on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I do not want to prolong the discussion or take up very much time on the amendment. Senators who have been on the floor today have heard the various discussions and have learned of our approach to this measure. Senators who were on both the subcommittee and the full committee know what positions, respectively, we have taken with respect to the proposed legislation.

The amendment which is now before the Senate, and which will be voted on in a few moments, provides for a 4-year extension of the present Airport Act.

It is an act which has been tested. It is an act with history behind it. Its provisions have been thrown into the open. The act has good points. So far as I am concerned, the good points in the measure far outweigh any of the factors and considerations of it which are detrimental in any way, shape, fashion or form.

With reference to what the Senator from Oklahoma mentioned about the approach I have offered for the consideration of the Senate I want to point out that the proposal is offered by the Senator from Kansas on the part of the members of the subcommittee of the minority side as a compromise. The objection to the administration bill was that it would gradually cut down the money authorized and wipe out any future consideration by the administration, or future interest in aviation, which is not the case.

In the spirit of a compromise—in the spirit of meeting the objection that the administration bill to provide $200 million per year was not enough—in the spirit of an endeavor to arrive at some basic, sound approach, we have proposed the continuation for 4 years of the present Airport Act. This must have had some significance, Mr. President and Members of the Senate, because the majority party, through the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma and the majority leader, offered to cut 1 year from the bill presently under consideration and to put it on the basis of 4 years, thereby cutting $100 million. It would appear to me, and it certainly should be apparent to the other Members of the Senate, that there is a recognition of validity in the position we have taken.

We are in favor of an airport bill. We are in favor of fostering the great aviation industry. But we do not think the facts in the RECORD show that we need $465 million. In no single year of the last 3 years, plus others even earlier, has there been the ability to legitimately spend more than $60 million, or roughly that amount.

I ask the indulgence of the Members of the Senate today. When we consider this important matter in the interest of balancing the budget, in the interest of a review, in the interest of a program which has been tried and tested and in which the people of the country have confidence, the amendment should prevail. I leave the matter in the hands of the Members of the Senate.

Mr. President, I reserve the rest of my time.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I have been requested to yield 3 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Alaska [Mr. BARTLETT] since the bill affects the State of Alaska. I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Alaska [Mr. BARTLETT].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alaska is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, I have rather a sympathetic consideration for the amendments proposed relating to the State of Alaska. I might be in favor of them, even, if I did not have such a dedication and devotion to the cause of fiscal solvency. I do not want to do anything now to imperil a balanced budget. If these amendments are adopted, the effect would be to imperil a balanced budget. Adoption of the amendments would cost the Federal Government more money during the next 4 years than would be involved in the formula provided by S. 1. The heaviest impact would come during the next fiscal year, when the desire for a balanced budget, as I understand the situation, is the greatest.

Under the proposed amendments the State of Alaska during the next fiscal year would receive $3.6 million, compared to $2,250,000 under the provisions of S. 1. In the total 4-year period the provisions of S. 1 would give the State of Alaska $9 million, while the proposed amendments would cost the Federal Government $11,080,000 for Alaska.

There has been a special formula applied to Alaska since the inception of this law, for a special reason. I think there was demonstrated before the committee, in the testimony, a good reason why the formula should be continued for the next several years. As a matter of fact, the administration will soon send to the Congress an omnibus bill relating to the new State of Alaska, and in some respects it is generous.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Alaska has expired.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I yield the Senator 1 additional minute.

Mr. BARTLETT. The bill will give the new State some transitional aid. This has been a customary procedure relating to many new States. The formula will enable the new State of Alaska, which is as yet without land, to build airports in an area where the airports are more badly needed, perhaps, than in any other part of the United States, because there is such a unique and almost exclusive dependence upon aviation.

I hope the amendments relating to the State of Alaska will be rejected, and that the formula which has been carefully considered and adopted by the committee in S. 1 will be followed.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I yield 4 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Are there 4 minutes remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas has 10 minutes remaining.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Ten minutes remaining on this side?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Then, Mr. President, may I request that the Senator yield me 5 minutes.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Illinois.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, the issue involved here is not very difficult to understand. I think it is generally agreed that we are talking about a legitimate operation of the Federal Government. It follows, I think, somewhat the observation made by Abraham Lincoln long ago:

> The legitimate object of Government is to do for the people what needs to be done, but which they cannot by individual effort, do at all, or do so well, for themselves.

This is an area in which some aid on the part of the Federal Government is certainly a legitimate function. The whole question is always, How far does the Federal Government go?

I was rather interested in looking at the yearbook figures for the Civil Aeronautics Administration, to see the percentage figures of how the Federal Government's share has grown over a period of time.

The early days of the program took place in 1933. I remember them well. I remember some of the airports which were built under the emergency programs. I think in Maine about half of the cost was paid by private people and half of the cost was a local cost.

In the period from 1933 to 1940 about 3 percent of the cost was borne by private individuals, about 24 percent of the cost by local authorities, and about 71 percent by the Federal Government.

In the period from 1941 to 1944 the Federal share had grown to 90 percent.

The question is whether this participation is going to continue to grow so that the program becomes a Federal rather than a local responsibility, insofar as those aspects of the program are concerned which are not conducive to or directly related to the whole question of what I call the portal-to-portal safety, or what we can call the door-to-door safety—from the time one gets into an airplane until one gets out. That involves the meteorological and navigational aids, the runways and all other components. That is about the place, within reason, we ought to stop.

There is one other reason why the proposal submitted by the minority ought to prevail. It is an adequate proposal. It goes far enough for the Federal Government. In addition thereto, there is a tremendous impact upon the 1960 budget. Only yesterday we observed an impact on the Federal budget, as it came to us, and nobody can be sure of the total effect. It was estimated last night the effect of passage of the housing bill would be $40 million. If one considers the Clark amendment, I think the effect is closer to $200 million, and nobody can disabuse me of the idea until we see some interpretation of the language which was written into the bill.

So we had the first impact on the budget yesterday. We may have the second impact today, depending upon the outcome of the forthcoming vote. I think of the situation in terms of a kind of fiscal suicide on the installment plan—a little at a time. It is going to be dragged out, but it will be just as painful, and the headaches will be as overwhelming when we are through.

I think it is time for us to admonish the majority all over again that we intend consistently to hew to the line and seek to conserve the Nation's pocketbook, and also to conserve the dollar from the erosive effect which inflation has upon it.

When the Committee on Finance, under the able chairmanship of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD]—and I am glad to note his presence in the Chamber at this time—held a long hearing on fiscal and monetary policies, at least 71 schooled and skilled economists appeared before the committee. There were many areas of disagreement, but the one point upon which they all agreed was that deficit financing was inflationary in character, and that when it kicks the lid off, someone must pay the bill.

I think the time has come to repeat the warning, because this is no easy dish. I can well understand the deep concern of the President of the United States in this field. That is one reason why he admonished all the executive agencies to labor earnestly and painstakingly in the interest of a budget that would be in balance before it was submitted to the legislative branch.

I fairly bleed for the Secretary of the Treasury today. No one can witness the market craze, with people in all walks of life dabbling in the stock market, without realizing that what they are doing is siphoning away the capital funds which are the fruit and the product of thrift. This leaves a pretty thin, bare market in which the Secretary of the Treasury must work in order to peddle the bonds of his country.

Fifteen billion dollars in Federal bonds fall due this month. Every dollar of it must be renewed. The Secretary of the Treasury is beset with a terrific thin-market problem, to find a market for the securities of his Government. Inflation will only aggravate the problem as time goes on. So we should be pretty deferential to our Secretary of the Treasury, cooperate with him, bleed with him if necessary, and work with him against deficit financing and further burdens and charges upon the 1960 budget.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield the distinguised minority leader 2 minutes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am deeply grateful to the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma for the additional time.

I believe this point must be made. Think of all the speeches that were made on this floor late yesterday afternoon and last night, on the question of freezing the interest rate on some of the direct housing loans by the VA and the FHA. Consider the thin market in which the Secretary of the Treasury must shop to sell his Government's securities.

How does he find a market? He must pay more for renting people's money for his Government. That is as simple and elemental as falling off a log.

One may wonder why or how interest rates go up. There is no mystery about this business. Money is a commodity. When one goes into a grocery store and asks for a can of corn or a pound of butter, the price is so much, and he pays it. When one wishes to borrow $100, it is a commodity. The market determines the price.

With all the money going into a crazy, fantastic stock market, our Secretary of the Treasury is left high and dry. He has no choice except to say, "I will pay more for your money." When he says, "I will pay more for your money," up goes the interest rate. Then come all the beautiful scolding speeches about this administration and the interest rate.

We have only inherited a bitter problem and a grim legacy which has come down to us from the day when $80 billion of unpaid bills were laid on the desk of President Eisenhower. These things do not incubate in a day or a year. They require a little time.

We are now at a critical point. We ought to get down on our knees and pray for Bob Anderson, Secretary of the Treasury. We ought not to add to his burdens. This bill would only add to his burdens. To repeat, it is like fiscal suicide on the installment plan. I will resist it the best I know how.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I yield myself 2 minutes.

I appreciate very much the distinguished minority leader's plea to stay with the President's budget. However, I invite attention to the fact that the amendment by the united Republican forces on the committee would breach the President's proposal by $52 million over a 4-year period.

The Senator from Illinois mentioned the interest-rate fight of last night. On Capehart housing alone, the increase voted by the Senate last night will increase the Federal Government's costs by $195 million in those houses over the term of the mortgage. So when we are talking about balanced budgets, let us be realistic.

I invite attention to the wastage in the $77 billion budget proposed by the President, involved in the purchase of 10 VIP planes, in addition to 3 which have already been purchased; 10 more heavy jet transport planes in the budget, plus 33 smaller jetplanes, largely for the use of generals in flying a little faster around the country.

There are places where we can trim the President's budget. It is not an austerity budget—witness the two jetplanes, and one standby jet, for Mr. Dulles alone.

It should be the duty of Congress to try to balance the budget by placing emphasis on essential things and eliminating nonessential things. We are not told, and we must not be told, that we must spend money wastefully, and dare not spend money for constructive purposes which are absolutely necessary to keep the country abreast of the dynamic, growing transportation system which aviation has become.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I did not know there were any jetplanes provided for in the bill before the Senate.

Mr. MONRONEY. They are in the President's budget. The Senator will find 10 large jetplanes listed in the passenger-carrying portion of the Defense Department budget, and 33 more passenger-carrying jetplanes. They are listed as possible cargo planes, but it would be difficult to get more than four passengers into them, and I do not believe the cargo capacity is very large.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That question is not before us at this time. We could not reach it under any circumstances. But if my distinguished friend from Oklahoma can make even a prima facie case for striking those items out of the budget, he will have the vote of the minority leader.

Mr. MONRONEY. I shall be glad to have that vote. I intend to press for such action when the question comes before us.

What I am saying is that the Senator is asking us to support the President's budget. It is sacrosanct. We must not touch it. But we are going to touch it in many places. We shall trim a great deal of fat from it; and we also hope to accomplish the great things necessary for aviation in this country.

Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time and suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President——

Mr. MONRONEY. I withdraw my suggestion of the absence of a quorum. The Senator from Kansas has used all his time, has he not?

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I have not used all the time on my amendment.

I yield 2½ minutes to the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. COTTON].

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, I wish to use this brief time to touch on what the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma has said about breaching the President's budget. Let the situation be crystal clear. To be sure, the President called for $65 million in the fiscal year 1960, $55 million in 1961, and $45 million in 1962. The President's budget for the fiscal year 1960 called for $65 million, and the substitute we offer would appropriate $63 million, which is $2 million less.

When one says to the country, at the very opening of the fight to hold the budget, that we breached it yesterday, and are about to breach it again today, the psychological impact is far beyond that of the money involved. When we consider the percentage of increase from $65 million to $165 million, and start blowing up the budget to that extent through the coming months, we shall have $50 billion of deficit spending before we are through.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MONRONEY. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. MONRONEY. The yea-and-nay vote, as I understand, will be on the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL], to substitute $63 million a year for the $100 million proposal of S. 1. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote will be on the substitute for the bill. All time for debate having been exhausted, and the yeas and nays having been ordered, the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] are absent on official business.

I also announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] is absent because of illness.

On this vote, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND] is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG]. If present and voting, the Senator from Mississippi would vote "yea" and the Senator from Louisiana would vote "nay."

On this vote, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] is paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER]. If present and voting, the Senator from Indiana would vote "yea" and the Senator from Oregon would vote "nay."

On this vote, the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR] is paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY]. If present and voting, the Senator from Delaware would vote "yea" and the Senator from Wyoming would vote "nay."

Mr. DIRKSEN. I announce that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BEALL] and the Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL] are absent because of illness.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] is absent on official business.

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. WILLIAMS] is absent to attend the funeral of a member of his family.

On this vote, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] is paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER]. If present and voting, the Senator from Indiana would vote "yea" and the Senator from Oregon would vote "nay."

So Mr. SCHOEPPEL'S amendment was rejected.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I move that the vote by which the amendment was rejected be reconsidered.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I move to lay on the table the motion to reconsider.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRUENING in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MORTON], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT], and the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND], I submit an amendment which I send to the desk, and ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On the first page of the bill, between lines 2 and 3, it is proposed to insert:

That (a) section 2(a)(3) of the Federal Airport Act, as amended (49 U.S.C. 1101 (a)(3)), is amended to read as follows:

"(3) 'Airport development' means (A) any acquisition of land or of any interest therein, other than for automobile parking areas, or of any easement through or any other interest in airspace, which is necessary for development, operation, or maintenance of any public airport or portion thereof, or which is necessary to remove or mitigate, or prevent or limit the establishment of, airport hazards, and (B) any work involved in constructing, improving, or repairing a public airport or portion thereof, including the removal, lowering, relocation, and marking and lighting of airport hazards, but excluding (i) construction, improvement, alteration, or repair of any buildings or portions thereof, other than those buildings or portions thereof required to house air traffic control activities, weather reporting activities, and communications activities related to air traffic control, and (ii) automobile parking areas and entrance roads.

"(b) The amendment made by this section shall not operate to alter, restrict, or otherwise interfere with carrying out any work programed prior to the enactment of this Act."

On the first page, in line 3, it is proposed to strike out "That section", and to insert in lieu thereof "SEC. 2. Section", and to renumber the following sections of the bill accordingly.

On page 4, it is proposed to strike out lines 5 through 20, as follows:

SEC. 5. Section 13 of the Federal Airport Act (49 U.S.C. 1112), is amended by inserting "(a)" after "SEC. 13." and by adding a subsection to read as follows:

"COSTS NOT ALLOWED

"(b) With respect to amounts obligated after June 30, 1959, the cost of acquisition or constructon of that part of a project intended for use as a passenger automobile parking facility, and the cost of construction of those parts of passenger or freight terminal buildings and other airport administrative buildings intended for use as bars, cocktail lounges, nightclubs, theaters, private clubs, garages, hotel rooms, commercial offices, or gamerooms or such other use which, in the opinion of the Administrator, is not essential to the welfare and safety of those persons using airports for public aviation purposes, shall not be an allowable project cost under this Act."

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire is recognized for 5 minutes on his amendment.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, I wish to explain the amendment briefly so Senators will understand clearly and exactly what it provides.

This amendment frequently is referred to as the "gate to gate" amendment. But I contend that is a misnomer. It is not a "gate to gate" amendment, because it does not compel all Federal aid to stop at the gate. The amendment permits some aid to buildings. It does exclude aid for parking areas and for buildings except for the space required to house air traffic control activities, weather reporting activities, and communication activities.

In other words, it simply restricts the use of the funds so that they can be utilized only for those buildings or portions of buildings which house air safety functions. Make no mistake, Mr. President, this amendment permits use of funds for control towers, for quarters of those engaged in air traffic control, and for quarters of those engaged in dealing with information on the weather. It permits aid for all buildings and parts of buildings which are necessary and essential for air safety.

Therefore, I would prefer, rather than call it a gate-to-gate proposal, to refer to it as a wheels-down-to-wheels-up provision, because under it aid can be extended to all facilities required from the time a plane lands on the airport until it takes off again.

Very briefly, we contend the amendment should be adopted, first, because by adopting the amendment——

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, may we have order?

Mr. COTTON. May we have order, please?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order. Senators desiring to converse will please retire from the Chamber.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, I shall try to speak as rapidly as possible and not use all my time, if Senators will give me an opportunity to be heard.

First, the amendment means that the dollars will be used where they are most needed and where they can go the farthest—for the essential features of airports.

Let me mention one provision of S. 1, and I hope I may have the attention of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY] when I point this out. The Senator from Oklahoma has repeatedly referred to the fact that section 5 of his bill, which we are seeking to strike out and replace with the pending amendment, is a provision to prevent money being spent for nonessentials. The Senator has referred to that section of his bill, suggesting that by passing the bill in its present form we shall be protected against the use of Federal funds for those parts of buildings used as bars, cocktail lounges, nightclubs, theaters, private clubs, garages, hotel rooms, commercial offices, gamerooms, and so forth. As a matter of fact, I direct the attention of every Senator to the specific wording of section 5. It reads:

> and the cost of contruction of those parts of passenger or freight terminal buildings and other airport administrative buildings intended for use.

In other words, the provision does not state this money cannot be used for the construction of a building, a part of which shall be used for those purposes. This may not have been the intention of the framer of that provision, but under it Federal aid can be used for any building as long as only a portion of it is to be used for bars, cocktail lounges, and so forth. Federal aid rarely goes to more than 25 percent of a building. All that would have to be shown would be that the portion of the building used for those purposes comprised only 10, 20, 30, or 40 percent of the building receiving Federal aid. So I suggest a horse and wagon can be driven through that provision. It does not provide any protection against the use of money for nonessentials.

Federal aid money should be used for real needs. This amendment prevents money being used for those portions of terminal buildings utilized for commercial purposes. We build highways to the door of Woodward & Lothrop's department store, but we do not have the Federal Government help build the store where shirts are sold. We build highways, but we do not build the gas stations or restaurants which serve the motorists.

Is there any reason why Congress should continue, at this time when hundreds of millions of dollars must be devoted to making the airways safe, to provide money for terminal buildings where airlines are selling tickets and transacting business, where insurance companies are paying rental for booths to sell insurance, where restaurants are engaged in profitable business?

Last year the New York Port Authority received $125,000 for allowing an advertising agency to put signs within the terminals. They received $1,200 a month allowing an automobile model to be displayed. The Washington National Airport received $182,000 in revenue from insurance companies for their concessions. The Miami International Airport made a net profit of more than $2½ million in 1957. The Los Angeles International Airport made a profit of more than $2 million.

All the airport terminals are engaged in business. Large portions of those terminals are not devoted to air safety, to those who control traffic, to portions utilizing instruments and safeguards. They are operated for private commerce and private profit. Yet one-third—$66 million in the past 4 years—of Federal aid has gone into those terminals.

I suggest if the amendment is adopted we can save one-third of the money to be used under the bill. If the one-third is left in the bill, in the wisdom of Congress, it will be devoted, and this is the last point I wish to make to the prime and most important use—devoted to public safety.

This morning there was some colloquy in this Chamber regarding the sad and unfortunate accident at New York, where the American Airlines airplane crashed and so many lives were lost. Mr. President, it simply drives home, emphasizes, and highlights the fact that the prime consideration and the prime duty which hovers like a shadow over the Senate and over the Federal Government is that we should lose no time in spending all that is necessary, no matter how much it is, to modernize the airways, install automatic controls, and install every feasible automatic safeguard science has given us, in order that the lives of those who travel in the air may be preserved. No amount of money spent on terminals could have had any effect on the safety of people in that airplane.

That is the No. 1, prime priority in this whole program. All that my amendment seeks, Mr. President, is to make certain that we shall not spend our dollars for nonessentials.

Mr. President, how much of the 5 minutes do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has used 10 minutes.

Mr. COTTON. I have used 10 minutes. I wanted to be notified at the end of 5 minutes.

Mr. President, I shall conclude in just a moment.

There was a suggestion made during the hearings which I wish to repeat, because to me it was rather a significant phrase. Someone who testified said that the Federal Government had a duty not only to keep people safe but to keep them dry. That made me think of the young man who called up his sweetheart and said, "My darling, I love you. I would go through rivers of fire for you. I would climb mountains of ice. I would give my life for you. I will come over to see you next Saturday night if it doesn't rain."

Mr. President, we have a grave duty to perform; to see that tax dollars are not diverted for nonessentials. Federal airport aid should not be frittered away on buildings used for private commerce and profit. It should be spent for runways, aprons, and for taxi strips, which are vital to safety. The money should be spent for clear zones, which are vital to safety. The money should be spent for rights-of-way and to remove obstructions, which are vital to safety. The money should be spent for control towers, for housing the devices and controls of traffic which are vital to safety.

The amendment should be labeled the "safety first amendment."

If the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY] does not wish to yield time now, I will yield 10 muintes to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, I support the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire. I do so on the simple premise that it is improper for the Government of the United States to ask the taxpayers of this country to build, for the commercial air carriers, terminal facilities, whether for passengers or for cargo. Historically, our Government has never endeavored to help private industry in the manner in which it is helping the commercial airlines under the present program. What justification do we have for spending money of the taxpayers to build terminals either for passenger or for cargo? Personally, I can see no justification for doing so. There might be, if we were wallowing in money. Then it might be said that we could "dish it out" everywhere.

The fact is, my colleagues, that our fiscal situation is not sound. Every day the argument is made that trouble lies ahead for the United States, not only on the basis of military threats but also on the basis of the economic conquest which the Communists may make of us. Our dollar is now worth 47 cents. It has fallen 53 cents in value in the last 17 years. It has fallen at the rate of 3 cents a year. Our national debt is $285 billion.

I have listened to people make arguments, "You can take out of the bag more than you put in and the bag will never go empty. You can keep floating Government bonds on a glutted market and the public will buy those bonds. You can spend more than you take in, and all will be well. The great United States is immune, over and above that law of the consumer of demand and sales which has applied everywhere in the world." I am not willing to believe those statements. The United States will be governed by the same natural laws which govern the nations of the earth.

We are subsidizing the airlines, the merchant marine, the inland water carriers, the farmers, and the miners. All up and down the line subsidies are being paid.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Ohio has expired.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, may I request the Senator to yield me 5 additional minutes?

Mr. COTTON. I yield 5 minutes additional to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The taxpayer is being ground down more and more every day.

Before I conclude I should like to read what was testified to in 1951 when our Government through the Congress decided to quit pegging the price of Government bonds. I read what one of the principal witnesses said:

> There is no subtler, no surer means of overturning the existing basis of society than to debauch the currency. The process engages all the hidden forces of economic law on the side of destruction and does it in a manner which not one man in a million is able to diagnose.

If any of those who are listening to me own Government bonds, I suggest they read the article which was published in the February 1959 issue of the Reader's Digest, which was written by Andre Visson. I am going to read excerpts from the article entitled "What the French Have Found Out About Inflation." This is a case history of the worst swindle a government can commit against its citizens.

If we operate on a deficit basis and spend more than we take in, I say to my colleagues that we shall then begin to swindle and rob the people:

I read from Mr. Visson:

> Today, as a result of France's destructive inflation, the cost of living is 37 times what it was in 1927.
> Every Frenchman who put his savings in Government bonds or annuities, whether before of after World War II, has lost the major share of his capital. The scores of thousands of people who, in 1944–45, invested in the 3-percent bonds of the Liberation loan are today getting the same interest they did 13 years ago, whereas the cost of living is 10 times what it was then. And, were these French men and women to sell their bonds now on the Paris stock exchange, they would get only about half the price they paid in 1945—and in depreciated francs at that.

The writer says further:

> And consider the disaster to more than a million World War I veterans whose once adequate pensions are now worth 70 cents a month or less.
> Inflation corrupts everything—a balanced budget, investments, job security, social legislation, the moral health of all classes, even national prestige abroad.

In my opinion, every time we contribute toward deficit spending, bringing the budget into a situation where there is no semblance of relationship to the money available, we are corrupting the moral health of the American public. We cannot honestly tell the public, "We will devise a means whereby we can spend more than we take in, and yet survive." That is exactly what we are doing.

The article further states:

> A disastrous inflation can develop when a government continually spends vastly larger sums of money than it can collect in taxes.

I would be prepared to spend, but I would have the courage to tax; and if I did that, from the mountains of the Rockies and from the valleys of the Mississippi, from everywhere in the country, the taxpayers would say, "Quit spending, and spare us from taxation." But the swindle is in telling the public, "We will spend, but we will not have to pay."

The author further says:

> The obsession of the French politicians with making their constituents happy at any cost—even at the risk of compelling them to pay a high price tomorrow for the favors bestowed upon them today—has also been responsible for the ever-growing number of people on the Government payroll.
> The French are beginning to realize that there is not much difference between the state and a private person, as far as a budget is concerned. Neither can live beyond its means very long. To be sure, the state credit is infinitely greater than that of the richest individual. But even a national government's credit cannot last forever. When the state goes too heavily into debt, its citizens are, finally, the ones to carry the burden.
> This grim picture of what happens when a government tries to live beyond its income is on display today not only in France but in Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Peru, and other lands.
> In France the people have found that, contrary to all the glowing promises of their politicians, the state can give them nothing free. One way or the other, the citizens have to pay in the end. If they do not pay in taxes they pay in inflation, which is the highest and the cruelest tax of all.

The impact has not yet come. We are deceiving ourselves in the belief that it will not come. But let us remember that for every action there is a reaction. Where there is smoke there is fire; and where there is wrong there will be an atonement. It may be slow in coming, but irresistibly it moves on, and keeps saying, "You will pay the price." I am of the opinion that that is what will happen to us unless we pull ourselves together and try to have some semblance of relationship between our budget and the money available.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LAUSCHE. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. KEATING. I appreciate the Senator's bringing this fine article to our attention. I read the article, and was greatly impressed by it. I know Mr. Visson, the author. I know that he has painted a picture which the people of this country should be made to see. There must come a time when we put an end to spending beyond our means. The warning which the Senator from Ohio has voiced should be heeded.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, I yield 4 minutes to the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND].

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, the day of atonement which was spoken of so feelingly by the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE] has begun. There are evidences of it on every hand.

I hold in my hand an Associated Press dispatch received only a few minutes ago, showing what is happening to the credit of our country, and what is happening to the confidence of our people in the securities in our country. I cannot read it all. I read these few words:

> WASHINGTON.—The Treasury today made a surprise announcement that it will borrow $1½ billion in new cash next week. It needs the money because of what it termed unusually high "attrition" in its current $15 billion refinancing.
> The Department said holders of $2,081,000,000 (B) of maturing securities demanded payment in cash instead of exchanging them for new issues offered for this week.
> In response to inquiries, officials said the demands for cash payment—known as attrition—was "somewhat heavier than expected."

Are we going to be sensible people and see the signs which are so unmistakable, and which our citizens see clearly? Are we going to bring a halt to excessive and deficit spending, which is bringing us into this trouble? Are we going to spend the Federal money which must be spent in this field for the safety of the people who ride the airways—and their safety is not adequately safeguarded now—and desist from foolish and unnecessary profligacy in the field of building air terminals for people who are better able to build them than we are?

I am a friend of aviation. I have flown since 1918, when I began in military uniform. I note the presence in the Chamber of my friend the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL] who flew in another service at the same time, and others. We are friends of aviation.

In the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations which considers appropriations for civilian aviation, and as chairman of that subcommittee, I have consistently stood for the making of appropriations which are needed to make our airlanes secure and safe. As a friend of aviation, I am rising now to say that I think we would make a tragic mistake if we were to step up, at this time, and in this unnecessary way, the spending of Federal funds for such things as air terminals.

I hope the amendment of the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire will prevail.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I believe the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY], who is not in the Chamber, is prepared to yield me 5 minutes at this time.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Pennsylvania in the hope that I will get the 5 minutes back from the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. CLARK. I thank the Senator. I have listened with considerable interest to the talks by the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Florida. I am a little amazed at the point of view they have expressed. I do not believe that any Member of the Senate is in favor of deficit financing. I do not believe there is any doubt about the fact that every Member of the Senate has the political guts to raise the necessary revenue to the extent that it is required to balance the budget. I know that is true of the Senator from Florida, as it is of the Senator from Ohio. We are not concerned with the question of wild-eyed deficit spending. What is before us today is a question of facing up to the fact that we must remedy obsolescence in the public sector of our economy.

There is no doubt, as I said, that we must raise revenue, and that we must face up to that fact. However, there is no reason in the world for talking about runaway inflation, such as afflicted Germany and France. Let us face up to the fact that we must balance the budget, and that the only way we can balance the budget is by getting more revenue. Let us have the political guts to face up to that fact. We can do that by closing tax loopholes, and in that way find as much revenue as we need to balance the budget. I know that Members of the Senate have too much political courage to allow the budget to get out of hand.

I say to my friend the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] that if Secretary Anderson has trouble floating his Government bonds, he should get together with Mr. Martin of the Federal Reserve Board and arrange to get enough money into the banks to cut the interest rates.

We had a discussion yesterday on this subject. I was paired against lowering the interest rates. I would have voted "nay" had I been permitted to vote.

We must get at the core of the problem. The core of the problem is the control of the Federal Reserve System by the Government of the United States. Once that is done, we will not have any further trouble floating bonds.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I wish to call attention to the fact that what happened today with the Treasury was that the citizens of the United States showed their lack of confidence in the Federal securities by demanding, to the tune of $2,081 million more than had been expected, in cash rather than extensions, even at the higher rate of interest which the Senator has been speaking of.

Mr. CLARK. I wonder if the Senator from New Hampshire will agree that the time taken by the Senator from Florida should be deducted from his time.

Mr. HOLLAND. I make that request.

Mr. COTTON. Yes.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARK. I am sure the Senator from Oklahoma and the Senator from New Hampshire can work it out between them. In the meantime, I shall continue.

I say again to my friend from Florida that, although I do not pretend to be an economic expert, I do try to study these subjects as a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, and it seems to me that the reason for the extraordinary conversion to which the Senator from Florida has referred—and I assume it was largely by banks and pension funds, not by individuals—was that the holders of those bonds could make much more money in the stock markets and by buying corporation bonds, which carry a much higher rate of interest than the Government bonds. That is due largely to the policy of the Federal Reserve Board, not due to any lack of confidence in the soundness of the dollar.

This fact has been developed rather extensively by the testimony of experts before the Joint Committee on the Economic Report recently. I call attention to the fact that five out of six of the leading economists who testified before the committee last week advocated the necessity for greater Federal revenues in order to bring our economy up to a point of strength at home and abroad, which is so essential if we are to remain a first-class country.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. Again I should like to yield with the permission of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield an additional minute to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. The problem is whether the Senator from New Hampshire will agree that this time comes out of his time.

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield 1 additional minute to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. LAUSCHE. It will be interesting to see, if the bill is passed, what the commercial airlines will say when an effort is made to raise the tax on the gasoline and jet fuel they use.

Mr. CLARK. I do not care what they say. I will vote to raise the tax. I am sure the Senator from Ohio will also.

Mr. LAUSCHE. But they will fight it.

Mr. CLARK. That is all right. Let them fight it.

Mr. President, I support the Federal Airport Act extension bill—S. 1—which I have the honor of cosponsoring, in the form in which it is presently before the Senate.

Since the passage of the Federal Airport Act of 1946, our national airport system has been greatly improved, but much remains to be done if the ever-increasing needs of the country in the new jet age are to be met. What has been done and remains to be done in Pennsylvania provides a useful illustration of the need for the stepped-up program of Federal participation provided in the bill before us.

State and local interests in Pennsylvania have spent $26,136,608 under this program from 1946 to date to match an equal amount of Federal funds to improve 40 different airports in 38 different communities.

In fiscal 1959 alone 32 different communities in Pennsylvania submitted applications for Federal assistance indicating that State and local interests were prepared to expend $13,348,197 for airport projects, if Federal matching funds could be obtained. The actual allocation of Federal funds for Pennsylvania in the present fiscal year amounts to $3,902,783. This means that $9,445,414, or 70 percent, of the applications were refused because of the lack of Federal funds. Fourteen communities which had filed applications were allocated no Federal funds at all.

These applications which were denied were not for frills and luxury items, which opponents of the Federal participation program are so fond of citing.

Take for instance the application for the Bedford County Airport for $146,556 of Federal funds. These funds, and the like amount of State-local funds which were to be spent, were needed to purchase land and to construct a 3,700-foot runway and provide runway lighting. No Federal funds were allocated to this project for the assigned reason that there were "insufficient Federal funds."

Philadelphia submitted an application for $3,609,375 for construction of a new parallel instrument runway, connecting taxiways and relocation of a railroad installation and expedition of a taxiway for jet use and other purposes. One million dollars was allocated from the discretionary fund for these projects. The amount of $1 million was chosen because that arbitrary limit is assigned by the Federal agency to every contribution from the discretionary fund.

Pittsburgh's application for $1,500,000 Federal matching funds for a new east-west parallel runway met a similar fate: $1 million was allocated from the discretionary fund because that is the maximum amount permitted under agency rules adopted to make insufficient Federal funds stretch as far as possible.

These projects cannot be considered luxury items under any stretch of the imagination, Mr. President. The airports at Pittsburgh and Philadelphia are integral parts of the country's interstate transportation system, inasmuch as the services they render affect the interests, not only of the two areas immediately concerned, but of communities in neighboring locales as well.

Turning from present to future requirements, however, Mr. President, the time measure of the need for the extension and acceleration of the Federal Airport Act program can be seen. Gen. A. J. Drexel Biddle, chairman of the Pennsylvania Aeronautics Commission, has sent me a table which shows the needs of the Pennsylvania Airport System for the 1958–62 period.

I ask unanimous consent to have the table printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Pennsylvania airport survey, 1958–62

Land costs	$7,192,093
Landing area development costs	60,541,306
Administration buildings	17,349,000
Other terminal area costs	6,202,000
Total	91,284,399

LOCAL FUNDS AVAILABLE AND ANTICIPATED

On hand or appropriated	3,624,000
Bonds authorized not sold	2,016,000
Anticipated future funds	23,437,780
Total	29,077,780
Funds required in excess of local funds available	62,206,619

Pennsylvania airport survey, 1958–62—Con.

STATE FUNDS AVAILABLE AND ANTICIPATED

On hand or appropriated	$1,583,730
Anticipated future funds	14,971,316
Total	16,555,046
Total local and State funds	45,632,826
Funds required in excess of local and State funds available	45,651,573

Publicly owned airports, 49.

Airports reporting projects planned, 29.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the local and State interests are bearing their share, a full 50 percent share in these projects, and I need hardly remind those of my colleagues who have struggled with the problems of metropolitan and State finance what this 50–50 contribution means in terms of sacrifice for other needed community services. When Federal matching funds are not available or available in insufficient amounts, these projects do not get done, and our interstate transportation system, so vital to national defense, falls behind the needs of the times.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks an article which appeared last October in the Pittsburgh Press entitled "Six Million Dollar Jet Jolt Hits Airport"; a telegram sent to me by the president of the Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh; also letters from Blair County Commissioner, Edward J. Flanagan, and Mr. Don B. Kiel of Dubois, Pa., dealing with the subject under discussion.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Pittsburgh Press, Oct. 28, 1958]

SIX-MILLION-DOLLAR JET JOLT HITS AIRPORT—NEW RUNWAY PLANS MADE OBSOLETE BY LATEST CAA EDICT

Allegheny County today suffered a $6 million jolt from the jet age.

Ultra-modern Greater Pittsburgh Airport isn't big enough to handle the new jet airliners.

Just as the county commissioners were about to call for bids on a new $7,500,000 east-west runway at Greater Pitt, they received word from the Civil Aeronautics Administration that the proposed runway was too small for jet airliners.

TO COST $12 MILLION

Stretched out to a satisfactory length and doubled in width, the new runway will now cost $12 million, County Aviation Director John B. Sweeney estimated.

On top of that, since President Eisenhower vetoed an airport subsidy bill, the county stands to lose $1,500,000 it was already anticipating in Federal aid in constructing the original runway, bringing the total financial blow to $6 million.

Mr. Sweeney said it will take "several months" to redo the blueprints to meet new international runway specifications for jets.

The original proposal called for a 7,500-foot runway, 500 feet wide.

ONE THOUSAND BY TEN THOUSAND FIVE HUNDRED FEET

The new "specs" require 10,500 feet of paving 1,000 feet wide.

Mr. Sweeney said he has no idea where the county will get the money for the extra yardage.

But Commissioner Howard B. Stewart gave him a clue.

"You can bet that Allegheny County will be in there pressing for additional Federal subsidies when the next session of Congress convenes," he said.

As originally planned, the Federal Government would have footed half the bill, or $3,750,000.

Uncle Sam put up $2,250,000 of that money before the Presidential veto of a new subsidy bill was passed, leaving the possibility of collecting the remaining $1,500,000 in doubt, Mr. Sweeney said.

PITTSBURGH, PA., January 27, 1959.

Hon. JOSEPH S. CLARK, Jr.,
U.S. Senator,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.:

In considering measures to aid local communities and development of improved local air carriers, Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh respectfully points out substantial impact upon this area will be gained through extension Federal Airport Act proposed under S. 1.

Improvement all airports particularly urgent and required in view of (1) introduction of large jet and turbojet aircraft, (2) substantial curtailment and abandonment of rail passenger services, (3) urgent need for expansion and improvement of many airports served by local air carriers, (4) overall need to expand local air carrier service patterns. Your consideration and support will be appreciated.

ROBERT M. WACHOB,
President, Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh.

COMMISSIONERS' OFFICE,
COUNTY OF BLAIR,
Hollidaysburg, Pa., February 5, 1959.

Hon. JOSEPH CLARK,
U.S. Senator,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: An airport bill in the Senate, known as the President's airport aid bill, would rule out Federal aid matching funds for terminal buildings and hangars.

This bill, if passed, would have a very serious effect on a project now in progress in Blair County and I wish to urge you to vote against this bill and vote for Senator MONRONEY's bill, S. 1, which will include all these items.

Thanking you, I am,
Sincerely yours,

EDWARD J. FLANAGAN,
Blair County Commissioner.

THE UNION BANKING AND TRUST CO.,
Du Bois, Pa., January 9, 1959.

Senator JOSEPH S. CLARK,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR CLARK: We were exceptionally glad to read, in yesterday's local paper, that you are going to cosponsor a bill increasing from $1,902,130 to $3,011,706 the amount of Federal aid for Pennsylvania airports. We understand that this bill is practically the same as the one passed by Congress last year but vetoed by President Eisenhower.

When we met in Reynoldsville last year at the luncheon arranged by Bruce Milliron, you will recall that Mr. George W. Yohe, president of the Du Bois Deposit National Bank and the writer talked with you at the luncheon table regarding Small Business Administration and the Du Bois-Jefferson County Airport, which was then under construction. I believe that we had informed you that the entire sponsor share of this airport, which amounts to a little over $200,000, had been pledged by firms and individuals in Du Bois and the surrounding area and that the entire eight hundred odd thousand dollar airport, when completed, would be entirely free of debt.

We are now ready to surface the runway and erect an administration building but the Presidential veto last fall causes us to be approximately $61,900 short and, if the airport bill that you are going to sponsor is passed, these funds will be available but if is not passed, then these funds would have to be forthcoming from another source and this is a project on which Representative VAN ZANDT has been working diligently for over 3 months.

If you can find time to do so, we would certainly appreciate your discussing the matter with Mr. VAN ZANDT and possibly the two of you can come up with some solution to our problem.

Both Mr. Yohe and the writer are members of the airport authority and we were delighted to learn of your cosponsoring the airport bill.

With kindest personal regards in which Mr. Yohe joins me, I am,

Very truly yours,

DON B. KIEL,
Treasurer.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I yield 1 minute to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I had intended to discuss the bill at greater length, but I know that most Senators have heard all the arguments pro and con.

Why is the bill so urgent that we must act on it now? The National Association of State Aviation Officials—a nonpartisan, nonpolitical group, representing all of the States, told us that:

Forty-four State legislatures are now, or will be, in session within the next few weeks. Most of them will not be in session again for another 2 years. They are now faced with the problem of acting on State airport programs and appropriations without knowing the amount of Federal money, if any, that will be available for carrying out the national airport program on a partnership basis after June 30.

If S. 1 is speedily adopted, it will permit at least some of the State legislatures to more effectively and efficiently plan and finance their State airport programs for the ensuing 2 years. For this reason in particular NASAO urges favorable and prompt action on this bill by your committee and the Congress (p. 88–89 of the hearings).

This informed expert group told us that there are many cities which are ready to go forward with projects immediately if Federal funds are made available and the program is continued. If we delay action on the pending bill, we will only throw off State programing for almost 2 years, and thus create a real bottleneck at many of our airports in the United States. That is really the reason why the bill should have been signed by the President last year when the Congress sent it to him.

I merely wish to add that when we talk about balancing the budget we should remember that all Federal budgets which have been submitted, both the present one and those under Democratic Congresses, have always been balanced insofar as appropriations are concerned. We actually appropriated less last year than was requested in the budget. When the budget gets out of balance, it is because the income is not sufficient. Sometimes that may happen briefly, but the national debt is, as we all know, primarily a war debt.

I have no doubt that the bill, if enacted, will help balance the budget. It will create activity. There is a crying need for such activity within every State legislature, who are meeting now, and will not meet again for 2 years. Even if the program is adopted, there will still be a 5-year lag because of the technological advancement in aviation, which is so vital to us, both in our domestic and in our foreign economy. Therefore, even if the program is adopted now, there will be a 5-year lag between its adoption and the adequacy of the airports in the country to meet the needs of the people.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Washington has expired.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I yield myself 3 minutes. There is unquestionably a misunderstanding about the role and importance of terminal buildings. In the first place the testimony was conclusive before our committee that for every dollar the Federal Government puts up under the Federal airport program for terminals, $4 is invested by the local community. The bigger the terminal, the less the Federal funds that go into the terminal. For example, in the New York Port Authority airports at Idlewild, La Guardia, and Newark, only 6 percent of the entire project cost of the terminals has been paid for with Federal money. At Wayne Major in Detroit, only $1 out of every $6 is Federal money. At Los Angeles International Airport, not one cent of Federal money has been spent for terminal buildings.

The only matching that we could find or discover in the hearings was in the case of the small airports, where the cost was around $100,000, and where it was impossible for the cities to raise any further money.

Mr. President, the Government gets results from the money it spends. The Government occupies, rent free, on today's basis, a total of 800,000 square feet in the airports. That space ordinarily would cost $3 a square foot a year. So we are getting approximately $2,500,000 worth of space rent free each year for the contribution we make. Measured over a 30-year period, this would mean $75 million in savings during the average life of the bill. We are getting more than we are putting in, because of the large amount of space the Government occupies.

The amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. COTTON] provides that the Government could pay the full cost, the total cost, of the construction of the following facilities: Air traffic control activities, weather reporting activities, and communications activities. The Government will require more and more space in the years ahead, because radar is fast coming into wider use. More and more electronic equipment is being used. So more and more space will be required.

If the Federal Government does not put any money into the building of terminal buildings, do Senators think that the cities will float bonds to build the structures to house the Government's equipment? They will not. So Congress will be asked for funds to build Federal buildings at the airports according to Federal specifications and regulations.

I say the Federal Government is today getting a better bargain than it would be getting under the Senator's amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield myself 2 additional minutes.

The matter of taxes has been mentioned. I wonder if Senators who allude to it know that from the aviation fuel tax the Government is collecting approximately $50 million a year at the present rates. During the life of the bill, considering the increase which will take place in aviation activities, I believe the amount will easily reach $100 million a year.

On top of that, there is a yield of $110 million a year from the 10-percent tax on airline passenger travel, based on 1957 air traffic. So aviation is more than carrying its load.

One final point. Throughout the Nation, airport commissions have done excellent work. They have built the facilities which the AAA and the CAA insisted were necessary up to 50 percent of their money. Many of them have been operating in tar-paper shacks and lean-to's which were built in 1932. So this amendment would penalize the very airports which have done the best work, by changing the rules in the middle of the game. The rules for matching funds were established in 1946. At this late date it is proposed to say to the airport commissions: "You may have built your runways and many of the other things which you were required to do. But you are too late. You should have built your terminal buildings first, when there were matching funds."

To say that would be grossly unfair to the States and cities which have used their matching money to do the things which the AAA and the CAA said should be done.

Mr. President, if the Senator from New Hampshire will yield back the remainder of his time, I will yield back the remainder of my time, and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, I will agree to yield back the remainder of my time if the Senator will ask for a vote immediately.

Mr. MONRONEY. I withdraw my point of order that a quorum is not present, and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire will state it.

Mr. COTTON. Do I correctly understand that a "yea" vote is a vote for the amendment to prevent use of Federal funds on any parts of terminal buildings which are not used for essential air safety and communication activities?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON] are absent on official business.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I call up my amendment at the clerk's desk which I offer on behalf of myself, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. COTTON], and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, on page 2, lines 5 and 6, to strike out the figure "$95,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figure "$65,000,000";

On page 2, line 23, to strike out the figure "$5,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figure "$4,500,000";

On page 3, line 18, strike out the figure "$65,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figure "$30,000,000."

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I yield myself 3 or 4 minutes on the amendment. I have had no requests for time. I shall be prepared, if the majority side will do likewise, to yield back the remainder of my time thereafter. I understand the Senator from Oklahoma will consume only 3 or 4 minutes. The Senate can get to a yea-and-nay vote in the next 10 minutes.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, my amendment deals only with the amounts of money provided in the bill. It changes no provision in the bill other than the monetary authorizations. It reduces the figure provided in Senate bill 1 of $95 million for the 48 States, without Alaska, from $95 million to $65 million. It reduces the money made available for Alaska and the Territories from $5 million to $4½ million. It reduces the so-called discretionary fund from $65 million to $30 million.

It leaves in the bill approximately $100 million—$99.5 million—available for the critical fiscal year 1960.

I know perfectly well, and I have been assured by General Quesada and others, that the amount I have proposed is all that can be programed or obligated.

The question occurs to me, Do we want a bill or not? We know a measure similar to S. 1 was not signed into law by the President after the adjournment of the last Congress. I plead for this proposal because I say it includes all the funds which can possibly be obligated.

Secondly, I think there is a reasonable chance that the bill can become law if my amendment is accepted. We need a program.

Third, I think the proposal is in keeping with our fiscal responsibility and our general responsibility as Members of Congress.

I hope my friend from Oklahoma will accept the amendment. I have faint hope, I must admit. I cannot speak for the President or the White House, but I honestly believe there is a chance that something of this nature could become law, so such a program could go forward, so airports will know where they are going, so the planning and programing can proceed.

The effect of my amendment, as I have said, is to reduce the impact on the budget. The effect of it, as I have said, is to reduce the impact of S. 1 on the budget for fiscal 1960 by $65 million, and to reduce the impact on future budgets by $30 million a year.

As I pointed out earlier today, if we give authorization to the Federal Aviation Agency of more money than it can use for the top priority projects which must be met, the money will be given to projects which are not so important and not so essential.

Many Members in this body served on the other side of the Capitol. A good many served in the 80th and 81st Congresses, when there was before that body a question as between an airport for Fort Worth and one for Dallas. The Members of Congress who represented those two great communities, both of them fine gentlemen, both of them great statesmen and patriots, and both of whom were my close friends, got into the battle as between Dallas and Fort Worth. The question was kicked around and around. Of course, both cities now have two great airports. One airport has had a great deal more Federal contribution than has the other. But we shall have continuing battles of that nature if we give the Agency more money than it needs. If there are two or three hundred million dollars available in the back room, Senators will approach the Agency with constituents, bang on the door of the Agency, regardless of the justification of the request, and say, "We know the money is in the back room. Give us our share. Give us this, that, and the other."

I will make this promise to the Senator from Oklahoma. If the $30 million which remains in the discretionary fund in my amendment and the $65 million in the general fund which is included in my amendment are exhausted, or if the funds are ever entirely obligated, I will join him in a request for increased funds.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished junior Senator from Texas.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, I should like to use the 3 minutes to review the fiscal position of the Government. From some of the prophesies of gloom and doom we have been hearing from the other side of the aisle, one might be led to the conclusion that the Government is in such a condition that it is about to collapse. Let us examine our financial position, and see whether these gloomy estimates are justified.

In 1947, the national debt was $258 billion. Eleven years later, in 1958, the national debt was $276 billion, an increase of 7 percent in the last 11 years.

While our national debt was going up 7 percent, the gross national product was increasing from $316 billion in 1948 to $440 billion in 1957, an increase of more than 33 percent in 10 years, as contrasted with an increase in the national debt of only 7 percent in 11 years.

The total indebtedness at the beginning of 1947 for all local governmental subdivisions and all States was $16 billion. In 1958 the total indebtedness of States and local subdivisions of government was $56 billion. The debts of States and local subdivisions had increased 352 percent in those 11 years, while our national debt of the United States Government was going up only 7 percent.

In that 11-year period from 1947 to 1958, private indebtedness increased on a large scale also. But while all types of debt were increasing in that post war decade in America, the national indebtedness of this Government was increasing at a smaller rate than any of the other types of indebtedness.

Our national indebtedness was not increasing at as fast a rate as our gross national product was increasing.

The prophesies of gloom and doom are not borne out by the cold statistics of what is happening in America. At the same time the gross national product was going up from $316 billion to $440 billion, in that same 10 years the population was increasing, the number of industrial plants were increasing, our productive capacity was increasing, and educational opportunities for Americans was increasing. We were training our youth for an even more productive security. Everything that makes for a richer life and for a more productive life was increasing, too.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. I understand the Senator's argument is that this country, under the Eisenhower administration, is really not in as bad shape as the Republicans seem to think it is.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I agree with the distinguished Senator from Louisiana. The administration has not succeeded in wrecking the Government as badly as our Republican friends across the aisle claim.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Texas has expired.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. I congratulate the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma for his leadership with respect to the bill. I had the privilege of sitting through most of the hearings. The hearings were thorough. The testimony is covered in this volume of the transcript. The need for this bill has been shown.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement of the Federal aid-to-airport construction in my home State from 1956 to 1959.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I yield one-half minute so that the question may be asked by the distinguished Senator from Ohio and the answer given.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I should like to ask for either corroboration or denial.

In 1940 the debt of the country was $50 billion and the gross national product was $100 billion, or a ratio of 1 to 2.

In 1958 the debt was $280 billion and the gross national product was $430 billion. How can it be claimed that the fiscal stability in 1958 on the basis of that proportion is as great and as strong as it was in 1940?

Mr. MAGNUSON. That was prior to the war.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. The Senator refers to 1940. The statistics I gave were from 1947 to the present, from the end of the Great World War to the present. The fiscal position of the Government is better today than it was in 1947. In 1947 our gross national product was $316 billion and the public debt was $258 billion. Our public debt at that time was five-sixths of the gross national product. In 1958 our gross national product was $440 billion and the public debt was $276 billion. We have greatly improved our fiscal position in the last 11 years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I yield myself 3 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, as much as I would love to accommodate my distinguished colleague from Kentucky, who was most faithful in his attendance at the hearings, I do not think one can relate the amount provided in the amendment to any factual evidence before the committee. In the first place, the Senator is requesting a cut for the first year from $95 million to $65 million, and that is the year when we shall have the highest need for funding of airport work, for the jet planes which we now have and for the high performance aircraft which will be stepped down to the "milk runs." As a result, more airports in smaller towns will have to be built soon, unless we want to postpone work for a couple of years despite the fact that the need exists now.

No large amount of money would be saved under the proposal. We would only deceive the people by saying we had reduced the amount. I do not mean that would be intentional. However, the actual funding that would be provided would not give the true picture, because it would be a one-shot cut and the work would still have to be done.

I say the proposal is not realistic. Last year we had $63 million. The Senator is proposing a fund of $65 million, or only $2 million more. Last year we were short $129 million in appropriated, authorized funds to match what the cities were prepared to spend. It would be completely unrealistic to delay further the necessary work which the cities and the CAA feel needs to be done.

In the second place, the Senator offers to cut the $65 million discretionary fund to $30 million. That is a complete reversal from the testimony of General Quesada, who came before the committee and asked for a formula to provide $100 million in the discretionary fund.

The administration program called for a $250 million base, with 50 percent of it discretionary. The general said that he needed the money in the discretionary fund. If the need is not present, if there should be no emergency, and if there is not a requirement for spending, in the light of the budget versus the safety needs for these airports, can we not trust the President's own appointee to not spend the money?

The money is to be made available. It should be available for commitment if it is found to be needed. If we wait another year, we will delay further the planning and the bond issue voting. Thus we would defeat the whole purpose of the discretionary fund.

Mr. President, I ask for a vote on the amendment, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I yield myself 1 minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky is recognized for 1 minute.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, my amendment provides $30 million in discretionary funds immediately, and 25 percent of the rest is in discretionary funds. That adds up to $91 million. All recoveries would go into the discretionary fund, as to that which is programed and not used. My amendment certainly would provide at least $100 million in discretionary funds. The $65 million per year is more than we have been able to spend for the last 4 years.

Mr. President, I yield back the balance of my time.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote! Vote! Vote!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MORTON] for himself and other Senators. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll.

I also announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] is absent because of illness.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] would each vote "nay."

On this vote, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND] is paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY].

If present and voting, the Senator from Mississippi would vote, "yea" and the Senator from Massachusetts would vote "nay."

On this vote, the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR] is paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY].

If present and voting, the Senator from Delaware would vote "yea" and the Senator from Minnesota would vote "nay."

Mr. DIRKSEN. I announce that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BEALL] and the Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL] are absent because of illness.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] is absent on official business.

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. WILLIAMS] is absent to attend the funeral of a member of his family.

On this vote, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] is paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER].

If present and voting, the Senator from Indiana would vote "yea" and the Senator from Oregon would vote "nay".

The result was announced—yeas 37, nays 48, as follows:

So the amendment offered by Mr. MORTON for himself and other Senators was rejected.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 4, line 20, after the period, it is proposed to insert the following:

In the event of a showing to the Administrator that any part of a project for construction or acquisition of any building, other than a passenger terminal, intended primarily for use by private enterprise, can be financed from private sources on reasonable terms, he shall take such fact into consideration in allocating funds under this act.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I have discussed the amendment with the ranking minority member of the committee. I believe we can take the amendment to conference, and perhaps it will be a good factor in the bill. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I yield such time as the Senator from Utah may require.

Mr. MOSS. Mr. President, one of the first bills I agreed to cosponsor upon my arrival in Washington was the measure before this body today. If we are to meet the excessive cost of airport facilities in the jet age that is rushing toward us, if we are to provide the Nation with a network of safe and modern civil airports, then we must continue and expand the Federal airport aid program.

States and local municipalities throughout the country have shown they are willing to shoulder a large share of the financial burden for providing adequate airports. For example, last month the voters went to the polls in Salt Lake City to approve overwhelmingly a $2½ million bond issue for improvements at the city's municipal airport.

But when you consider that the indispensable requisite for jets and other highspeed aircraft is longer runways, and that to add about 1 foot to the length of a runway costs over $1,000, and that the extension of a heavy duty runway by just 1,000 feet would mean an additional cost of $1 million, you can see that to bring our air transportation system up to the jet age requirements is far beyond the capabilities of our local communities. It is not therefore, a question of whether we should consider extending Federal assistance to the Nation's airports—but of how much assistance we must give.

The bill before us requires matching of both allocated and discretionary Federal funds by local or State funds on a 50–50 matching basis. It is in the national interest to continue this program of National-State-local cost sharing.

How important its passage is to my State of Utah is indicated by some figures I received from the Utah State Aeronautics Commission. The figures are based on the returns from a questionnaire submitted to all political subdivisions owning or operating airports in our State and sets forth anticipated needs through 1962. Reports were received from 17 operating airports. Also included in the total figure are needs of airports for which planning and construction were contemplated in the 1958 national airport plan.

The results indicated that $8,750,657 would be needed for aviation facilities in the State of Utah through 1962, but that local funds which could be made available total only $4,190,135, or less than half the amount required.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD several paragraphs from a letter I received from Mr. Harlon W. Bement, director of the Utah State Aeronautics Commission, which gives the Utah picture in more detail.

There being no objection, the excerpts from the letter were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In order to compile a work program of anticipated needs in Utah for the period 1958 through 1962, during the month of December 1957, we submitted an airport questionnaire to all political subdivisions owning and/or operating airports. The following airport authorities submitted answers: Price, Coalville, Provo, Salt Lake City, Vernal, Kamas, Ogden, St. George, Cedar City, Kanab, Loa, Green River, Tooele, Richfield, Logan, Fillmore, and Brigham City. In addition to these, the national airport plan for 1958 included planning for construction at American Fork, Bluff, Dugway, Laketown, Mexican Hat, Panguitch, and Wendover.

Because the entire report is quite detailed and lengthy, I am merely submitting total funds estimated required from our survey, continuing through 1962:

Land costs	$236,500
Landing area development costs	2,867,507
Administration buildings	4,212,000
Other terminal area costs	1,434,650
Total need	8,750,657
Existing local funds available and anticipated or on hand, or appropriated	209,715
Anticipated future funds	3,980,420
Total	4,190,135

Funds required in excess of local funds available came to $4,560,522.

Total State funds available and anticipated came to $350,000.

Total State and local funds anticipated, $4,540,135.

Funds required in excess of the total local and State funds available, $4,210,522.

As you are aware, Salt Lake City voters went to the polls in a record number approving a $2½ million bond issue for improvements at the Salt Lake City Municipal Airport.

Unfortunately, we are one of those public land States of smaller population and less tax income than the more populated areas. Geographically, air transportation is ideal for Utah. We are rapidly developing industry, uranium, oil, and gas interests, and, of course, the completion of the Flaming Gorge and the Glen Canyon Dams, and the resulting power available, will ultimately make Utah the most rapidly expanding State in the Nation. We must provide adequate air transportation facilities—not only military, but civil—within our State, and it is apparent from our survey that we do not have the finances to accomplish this as rapidly as it must be done.

The number of active civil aircraft in the United States was 67,153 at the close of 1957. There were 6,745 civil planes produced in 1957; thus if production continued, there were close to 75,000 active civil aircraft during the year 1958. This represents a tremendous growth in general aviation. In fact, general aviation, as pointed out in the brochures, represents better than 40 times the number of domestic airline aircraft, and flies at least three times the number of hours flown by the airlines. We must keep pace with the landing facilities demand, not only for jet civil aircraft, but for the business aircraft owned and operated by corporations, companies, and businessmen.

Mr. MOSS. Mr. President, whether or not the turbojet plane tragedy at La Guardia Field this past week was due to faulty safety equipment at the airport has not yet been determined. But, as was pointed out in the Washington Post this morning, there can be no debate over the importance of equipping runways, especially with approaches over water, with full instrumentation for bad-weather landings. There can be no debate about the importance of building a nationwide network of airports suitable to modern aircraft, and capable of handling our jet-age air commerce which is already upon us.

So the bill (S. 1) was passed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I wish to express my deep appreciation to the very able Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY] for the skill, patience, understanding, and fairness with which he handled the bill. I know it has been a long, hard fight. I know he has had many discouraging moments. Through his efforts, a bill very similar to this was passed last year, only to be returned without the President's approval.

Hearings were held again this year. I think it is a great tribute to the Senator from Oklahoma and the members of his subcommittee that this evening a substantial majority of the Senate have voted to pass the bill again. I hope the other body will consider the bill at an early date and that it will then be sent to the President for his approval.

I express my appreciation to the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON] for his fine leadership in the full committee in reporting the bill to the Senate.

APPOINTMENT OF CHAIRMEN OF COMMITTEES ON FOREIGN RELATIONS AND BANKING AND CURRENCY

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I submit a resolution, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The legislative clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 77) as follows:

Resolved, That Mr. GREEN, upon his own request, be excused from further service as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations; that Mr. FULBRIGHT be excused from further service as chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency and that he be appointed chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations; and that Mr. ROBERTSON be appointed chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

RETIREMENT OF SENATOR GREEN AS CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, it was with great personal regret that I learned of the decision of the distinguished senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN] to retire as chairman of the important Committee on Foreign Relations. When I heard of his intention, I went directly to his office and urged him as strongly as I knew how to reconsider his decision. The next day I joined with the entire membership of the Committee on Foreign Relations in a similar plea.

But Senator GREEN refused to reconsider his decision. He said he had three loves: The United States of America, the U.S. Senate, and the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. He stated it as his belief that it was in the interest of the welfare of all three that he resign, and not continue to carry the heavy administrative burdens the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations is called upon to carry.

Then, as we left the Senate Foreign Relations Committee room, Senator GREEN, with the good humored smile of which only the brave are capable, walked out to the waiting press and announced his decision to the world.

Mr. President, when Andrew Jackson was dying at The Hermitage, Sam Houston, after traveling for days across the country, took his young son in to see his great hero. When they entered The Hermitage, Sam Houston realized that he had arrived too late, that Andrew Jackson had passed on just before he got there. But Sam Houston went on into the room where Jackson's body lay; and, as he looked into the countenance of that great American, he said to his son, "Remember, son, you have looked upon the face of Andrew Jackson."

Mr. President, the other day, after hearing the eloquent statement of one of the great men of our time, when he walked out of the Foreign Relations Committee room, I went to my home at the edge of town, and said to my two daughters, "I want you to remember that I have looked upon the face of THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN. He is one of the truly great men of our time."

As chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, he has presented to the world the kind of picture of which every American can be proud. Mr. President, that picture is a picture of a kindly man, a cultured man, a man dedicated to the civilized virtues of peace and cooperation.

THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN's mere presence in any nation was enough to send America's stock soaring.

He still will be with us in the Senate. We still will have the benefit of his experience, of his alert mind, of his wise and prudent advice. He always will have the deep and enduring respect, admiration, and affection of every man and woman who is privileged to serve with him.

Mr. President, in the history of the U.S. Senate, THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN has a permanent chapter that I predict will last as long as the institution of the Senate itself lasts.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a statement I made before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee; the statement was adopted unanimously by that great committee as expressing its sentiment.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR JOHNSON OF TEXAS BEFORE THE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE, UNITED STATES SENATE, ON FRIDAY, JANUARY 30, 1959

In the whole history of the Senate there have been few careers as distinguished as that of Senator GREEN.

He has served our country with distinction and with honor. He has presented to the world a picture of America embodied in a cultured and highly civilized gentleman who is deeply wedded to the traditions of freedom and democracy.

His love of country is so great that he has decided to resign the chairmanship of the Foreign Relations Committee—an action which I personally advised him against.

The Senate will still have his services. His alert mind and his vast experience in the field of foreign relations will still be available.

And I think he knows that every one of his colleagues regards him with deep affection and with great respect.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, Senator GREEN stepped down to be replaced by the young, able, dedicated junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT]. Senator GREEN knew that the committee chairmanship would be in wise and capable hands.

Senator FULBRIGHT will be replaced as chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee by the prudent, sound, devoted junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON]. We shall continue to be well served.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to my friend, the junior Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. PASTORE. First of all, Mr. President, I desire to associate myself with the eloquent remarks which have been made and the fine tribute which has been paid by our distinguished majority leader to my colleague, Senator THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN.

In all the years I have been in public life, I have never met a man who has displayed greater strength, intellectually, morally, and otherwise, than has my distinguished colleague, Senator THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN.

The fact that, in an era when most men are reaching for power, he would step down from his important position as chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, is quite typical of the integrity and the courage of this great American.

I know that all of us have a mixed feeling at this moment. We regret the fact that, because of circumstances personal to himself, Senator GREEN felt that he should relinquish his position of prestige, honor, and distinction in the Senate of the United States; but I do know that in doing so, he has gained greater recognition in the eyes, in the hearts, and in the minds of all Americans who know him, particularly those who know him so well.

I do hope for my distinguished colleague that not only will he have many, many more years of service in the Senate of the United States, but that the good Lord will give him good health to enjoy for the rest of his life all of the fine things to which he has been accustomed, and that he will continue to reflect credit not only upon the Senate and upon this great country of ours, but, indeed, also upon the fine State that is so proud of its THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to my good friend, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT].

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, the announcement, last Friday, of Senator GREEN's resignation as chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, came as a surprise to me. I deeply regret that he has decided that he should no longer continue to carry the extremely heavy burdens of the leadership of that important committee, in addition to his other duties in the Senate.

As all of my colleagues are aware, Senator THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN has devoted three decades to public affairs. In addition to his illustrious career in the United States Senate, dating from 1937, he served as Governor of the State of Rhode Island.

Because of my close association with him, and because of our service together on the Foreign Relations Committee, no one appreciates more than do I his unfailing courtesy and his generous treatment of those who have served with him, both in committee and on the floor of the Senate.

Senator GREEN's act in relinquishing the chairmanship of this important committee in itself exemplifies the selflessness of this man. He is a great patriot and a devoted servant of the Senate and of the Nation.

Mr. President, in these troubled times the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate needs the wise counsel of Senator GREEN. Knowing him as I do, I am sure that although he has relinquished the chairmanship of the committee, his every effort will continue to be directed toward service to the committee, to the Senate, and to the Nation. I know that all members of the committee will always welcome his excellent advice and excellent judgment.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a comparative analysis of the activities of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee from the 81st Congress through the 85th Congress. The analysis is further indication of the heavy burdens of committee work which have been met and disposed of during the chairmanship of Senator GREEN.

There being no objection, the analysis was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Comparative analysis of committee activity, 81st Cong. through 85th Cong.

	Measures considered by committee	Bills and joint resolutions enacted	Senate resolutions and concurrent resolutions enacted	Treaties ratified	Nominations approved	Meetings

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, the transcript of a nationwide radio broadcast paying tribute to Senator GREEN. The broadcast was made by the noted commentator, Edward P. Morgan.

There being no objection, the broadcast was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Few men in history have had their lives stretched across such a vast span of change and material progress as THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN, the oldest man ever to sit in Congress.

The evening of his professional years fell at noon today for the 91-year-old senior Senator from Rhode Island as that Texas stripling of 50 years, LYNDON JOHNSON, announced with blinking eyes and solemn voice that GREEN had resigned as chairman of that elite of legislative elites, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Even those perennially impetuous and impatient youngsters, the gentlemen of the press, who rarely stand on ceremony, were sobered by the scene in the ornate, crystal-chandeliered committee room in the Capitol. There in front of the huge oval green baize table in his high-backed leather chair sat the chairman, alone with the majority leader, who, though seated too, towered over him on his left. Politely, patiently, quietly, the old Senator waited, a slight gray shadow of a man as the big JOHNSON moved, not clumsily and with feeling, through his eulogy. It was more than a trite tableau of the 20th century paying tribute to the 19th, and as you groped for a way to capture the moment, it came suddenly in flash of reflected light from Senator GREEN's thick glasses. THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN was already 12 years old when Thomas Edison invented the electric bulb and now his lenses were casting back the flicker of a fluorescent tube, something that Edison had never seen.

Quickly time dipped, like the pitch of a ship in a rolling sea, and the spectator reached out to steady himself on the rim of the mahogany conference table. In 1867, when the Senator was born, the Secretary of State, in what turned out to be anything but Seward's folly, bought Alaska from Russia for 2 cents an acre, and the Mikado was restored in Japan. Bismarck was preparing for the Franco-Prussian War as Theodore squirmed and squalled as a baby in Providence. The telegraph was still unknown and the Curies weren't to discover radium for another 30 years. You could squint and imagine the decor of the room as a possible setting for the grim time of Andrew Johnson's impeachment in 1868 but not a single device in it was the same.

The only real reach back to the past came through this frail but still spry figure and even that was an improbable touch because he so belied his age. His deafness was compensated for by an electronic hearing aid in his left ear and if there was any quaver to his voice, it could be strengthened by the microphones into which he was now speaking. Besides, his haberdashery had not the sedateness of the Victorian age or even the starched stiffness of the Hoover era. In fact, his soft tan striped shirt and blue tie were accepted style for maturing Madison Avenue males a third the age of Senator GREEN.

The sweep of the panorama was made even more staggering by another scene that was transpiring on Capitol Hill at the same time. While this nonagenarian who predates the internal combustion engine, the phonograph, the fountain pen, the linotype and the income tax, while GREEN was telling the television film cameras that his eyesight and hearing weren't sharp enough to allow him to carry such a full load—he still plans to walk the 2½ miles from his bachelor club to work now and then—scientists were telling Senator JOHNSON's space committee that we hoped to have a man spinning around the earth in orbital flight in maybe a couple of years.

By his graceful realistic gesture, THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN has said the world, indeed not the universe, belongs to the young and the bold. He renewed however, his avowed intention to serve in the Senate until he is a hundred. A human milestone, he has by his act reminded the country as a whole that we have to adjust to change. And one hopes the younger and the bolder are as wise as he to see it.

This is Edward Morgan saying good night from Washington.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to my friend, the distinguished minority leader.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, wisdom is not the only human virtue. There are some other things that also win for a person a place in the hearts of his fellow men.

I think one of the greatest attributes a person can have is a sense of humor; and when the years have dealt so gently with such a person, his sense of humor, after having been displayed and maintained so unremittingly, is like a rare perfume: It cannot be scattered or used by its owner without also coming to rest on all the persons who are around him.

So I think of my friend, THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN, in terms of what was said in Holy Scripture; I refer to the description of Joseph of Arimathea, who, in that Good Book, is described in only a few words; but they are sufficient, because they are in themselves the equivalent of an entire book, for the Scripture says, "He was a good man."

Mr. President, that is an impressive and mouth-filling phrase in the English language.

I say to my gracious friend, Senator THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN, You are a good man. For your country, you have been good, and also for your colleagues. We salute you. We are delighted that you are going to be with us for a long time and that you are going to continue to give us the benefit of the great wisdom and the great sense of humor which have marked you as a nobleman among men. We appreciate you.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield the floor, so that my friend, the Senator from Montana, can be recognized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCCARTHY in the chair). The Senator from Montana is recognized.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, last Monday I made a few remarks about the retiring chairman of our Foreign Relations Committee, THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN, as did his colleague, the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PASTORE]. There is nothing that I can add now to what I said then, because I know that what I said on that occasion represented the feelings not only of the members of the Foreign Relations Committee, but also of the entire membership of the Senate, both Democratic and Republican.

Mr. President, at this time I wish to state that I had intended to request that there be printed at this point in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, a nationwide radio broadcast which was made on last Friday by Edward P. Morgan. However, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] has already had the broadcast printed in the RECORD, so I shall not request that it be printed at this point, too.

At this time I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD the statement about Senator GREEN which I made on Monday in the Senate.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Feb. 2, 1959, p. 1481]

RESIGNATION OF SENATOR GREEN AS CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, last Friday the Senate learned of the resignation of the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN] as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. During the years of his tenure, the committee handled many matters of vital importance to the Nation. It handled them well. It handled them with dispatch. No member of the committee contributed more diligently to the building of that record than did its outstanding chairman.

For those who have been associated with the Senator from Rhode Island in the Committee on Foreign Relations, his resignation can only be a source of mixed feelings. On the one hand, we are reluctant to lose his leadership. On the other hand, we do not wish to have him overtax his energies, no matter how formidable the challenges may be.

The members of the committee who were present when the Senator from Rhode Island tendered his resignation know how his colleagues tried to dissuade him. There was far more to that effort than mere ritual. There was in it deep affection, deep respect, and deep appreciation for his dedicated service.

Few Members of this body even begin to approach the fine Senator from Rhode Island in fullness of years. For that alone, he might have the special place which he holds among us. But it is not for that alone that we so highly regard him. His place in our hearts and in our midst derives from something more. It derives from his keen intelligence, his brilliant wit, his unfailing ability to draw the meaningful out of the vague.

The able Senator from Rhode Island has used time to accumulate more than years. He has used it to gather understanding and to sharpen his wisdom. We may, indeed, count ourselves fortunate if, at the end of our lives, our cups contain half as much of understanding and wisdom as his does now.

And the Senator from Rhode Island is not nearly at the end of the road. As a matter of fact, his response to these words is likely to be, "For heaven's sake, do not eulogize me; I'm not leaving the Senate until I am at least a hundred."

I say to the Senator that is splendid with us. We want the Senator from Rhode Island to go on for many years. We want him to continue to gather experiences at home and all over the world. We want him to remain, as he has ever been, always a source of new ideas and fresh thought. We want him to contribute out of his great fund of human feeling and acute intelligence, which is his life, to the work of the committee, to the Senate, and to the Nation. The State of Rhode Island needs him. The Nation needs him. We will need him until he is 100, and perhaps beyond.

Mr. BIBLE. Mr. President, I rise to add my tribute to the revered senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], one of the most beloved men in the U.S. Congress.

Those of us in the so-called middle-age group in the Senate have looked upon Senator GREEN as a shining example of mental and physical alertness.

As a Senator who has been a Member of this great body for a period of 4 years, I have had many occasions to look to this distinguished Rhode Island statesman for guidance and counsel. He has been unfailing in his kindness and spirit of warm and friendly cooperation.

Mr. President, I wish to echo the well-expressed sentiments of the able junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PASTORE], who said, in commenting on Senator GREEN'S announced retirement as chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, "The action of my esteemed colleague fills me both with regret for the decision and with pride for the man who made it."

THE NEW CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, on this occasion I wish to congratulate the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] on his elevation to the chairmanship of the Committee on Foreign Relations. I wish, too, to congratulate the Senate on its good fortune in having so exceptional a man available for this most difficult and taxing of all committee assignments.

The brilliant Senator from Arkansas brings outstanding qualities and qualifications to his new responsibility. Those of us who have been privileged to work with him in the Senate and in the Committee on Foreign Relations are familiar with his capacities. He is a scholar and educator of the highest caliber. He is one of the best informed Amercians on the international problems which confront the nations.

The chairmanship of the Committee on Foreign Relations will provide challenge and scope for his great intelligence and his human understanding, for his acute perception and intellectual energy, and for his great personal courage and integrity. The Nation needs these traits in every aspect of government. It especially needs them now, in matters of foreign policy. We can count on the fine Senator from Arkansas to serve with devotion and dedication the Nation's highest interest in these critical times.

It has been a privilege to work with the Senator from Arkansas for many years in the Committee on Foreign Relations. It will be an added privilege and honor to serve, now, under his chairmanship.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, an article entitled, "The Rise of a Young Man With Ideas." The article was written by Arthur Krock, and was published in the New York Times on February 3.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE RISE OF A YOUNG MAN WITH IDEAS

(By Arthur Krock)

WASHINGTON, February 2.—Sixteen years after the following words made history they seem to express no startling national attitude:

"[We favor] the creation of appropriate international machinery, with power adequate to establish and maintain a just and lasting peace among the nations of the world, and [favor] the participation of the United States * * * through its constitutional processes."

But at the time they were embodied in the public record as a statement of the international aims of the United States they marked the dramatic end of one chapter and the beginning of another in American foreign policy. As the Fulbright resolution these words and their author became famous in all the chancelleries of the world. But not for 16 years did power in the form of the chairmanship of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations come to match the fame of the young Representative from Arkansas who is now Senator FULBRIGHT.

Thirteen years ago the Senator gained fame of a different and unsought kind, with another idea. Unlike the proposition of the resolution, the expression of this idea was unpremeditated. He was musing aloud to oblige a reporter who asked for his thoughts on the election of a Republican Congress in 1946, only a year after President Truman had succeeded from the Vice Presidency. FULBRIGHT suggested that maybe, the times being so critical and the need for executive-legislative accord so vital, it might be a constructive act for President Truman to name a Republican as Secretary of State, the office (there being no Vice President) next in line of presidential succession, and then resign to permit this Republican to become President.

The arrival of newspapers at the White House has often set off explosions, but none that shook the walls more powerfully than the afternoon edition in which Senator FULBRIGHT'S meditation was published as a full-blown project. And for awhile the President more or less adhered to the estimate he then expressed that FULBRIGHT is an "overeducated, Oxford" expletive. But with growing experience of how chance comments of his own were turned into sensations, he reverted to his appreciation of the Senator's high qualities as a statesman.

Subsequent to House passage of the Fulbright resolution, September 1, 1943, it was approved by the Senate under the sponsorship of Tom Connally, of Texas, current incumbent of the Foreign Relations chairmanship to which FULBRIGHT has just succeeded. Then Representative James W. Wadsworth, of New York, Wendell L. Willkie and Thomas E. Dewey, who had aided the Arkansan in getting the support of the House, overrode the Republican isolationists at a conference at Mackinac Island, Mich., to put the party on record for a similar resolution. And the United States, which had refused to join Woodrow Wilson's League of Nations, was committed to the principle of the United Nations Organization, but with "power * * * to maintain," etc., curbed by one veto in the Security Council.

Less than 3 years after these events in foreign policy, Senator FULBRIGHT, still concentrating on measures to bring about a durable world peace, proposed, and Congress passed, Public Law 584. This made his name perhaps more favorably known in more countries than any American legislator in many decades. Described by Secretary of State Dulles, in 1956, as "the most fabulously profitable investment ever authorized by the Congress of the United States," it is the legislation by which teachers and students are exchanged between this and many other nations. It is the cultural counterpart to our military and economic collective assistance program through the agency of young people known the world over as "Fulbright scholars."

But, despite this international fame, the Senator at 53 has just attained his first office of direct power in the formulation and conduct of United States foreign policy. The rise was slow because of the operation of the seniority system. But in this instance the nation is the beneficiary of the system.

Fulbright's immediate objective is to relax the "rigidity and inertia" of the administration's conduct of foreign policy which he sees personified by Secretary Dulles. This conduct, and the mood it reflects, not the basic policies themselves, have been the objects of his effective and intelligent criticisms.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, it is most difficult for me to express, in mere words, the admiration I have for the learned and energetic senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN]. We have been associated on the Rules Committee since I first became a Member of the Senate. We have served together on the policy committee for many years. I have found him wise in counsel and sound in judgment. I have found him my friend.

It is regrettable that he has found it necessary to resign as chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee. His work, his leadership, within that important committee, illustrates the fact that he is one of the greatest American patriots of this age and, indeed, one of the most outstanding Americans of all time.

I am well aware of the fact that our friend from Rhode Island is well beyond the Biblical threescore and ten. Age, however, is relative, and when it comes to the fulfillment of personal duty, the senior Senator from Rhode Island is but a youth, with all the power, desire and ability of youth. I expect to see him at his desk, not only next year and the year after that, but for many, many years to come.

Of course, Mr. President, we Members of the Senate are fortunate in that the Senator from Rhode Island is shedding only some of the burden which he has so willingly shouldered for all these years. We are fortunate that he is retiring only a little bit. We are fortunate, for we shall still have the benefit of his wise counsel, his experience, his clear and brilliant mind. For that we may be thankful.

Not only will the Senate as a whole continue to have the benefit of this man's wisdom, but the Foreign Relations Committee will continue to profit by his membership. The chairmanship of that committee passes on to a competent and brilliant man, the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT]. It passes on to a man who well knows the aggressive leadership given by the senior Senator from Rhode Island. I am certain that the Senate Foreign Relations Committee will continue to play a leading role in strengthening the free world and in bringing a durable peace to all men, everywhere.

We of the Democratic policy committee, too, are glad that we will continue to have the benefit of his wise and experienced counsel in our deliberations, as we have had for these many years.

POVERTY IN THE NATION'S CAPITAL

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, recently two editorials, one from the Washington Post under date of February 1, 1959, entitled "One in Five," and the other from the Evening Star of the same date, entitled "Crime's Breeding Ground," were brought to my attention. The subject of these editorials is the shocking prevalence of poverty in the District of Columbia.

During the last session, the Subcommittee on Public Health, Education, Welfare, and Safety of the District Committee held an investigation into the problems of hungry children, which, in my judgment, was most worthwhile; it focused attention upon one segment of the major problem area of economic distress in the District. The report which occasioned these editorials resulted from a grant of the Eugene and Agnes E. Meyer Foundation, and it revealed with hideous clarity the situation which exists and which is a breeding ground for many of the social ills which plague the District.

As long as the Senate and the House of Representatives retain control of the municipal destinies of the District, we must accept a full measure of responsibility for eliminating the sources of social infection revealed by the report and portrayed in the editorials.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the two editorials to which I have alluded be inserted at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Feb. 1, 1959]

ONE IN FIVE

In smug Georgetown and in comfortable northwest neighborhoods the ugly face of poverty haunts the Nation's Capital like a ghost of the depression years. No area of the District of Columbia escapes the consequences of the groveling poverty in which more than 11,000 Washington families exist. It is shocking enough to know that one Washington child in every five does not have enough to eat, lacks adequate clothing, and lives in squalor. But it is even more distressing to know that practically nothing is being done to pull the poor out of the muck.

The figures are particularly disturbing when they are contrasted with the Washington area's median family income statistics. The latest board of trade estimates show that the District's median family income in 1958 was $5,660. The Washington area figure was $6,860, an increase of 6 percent over 1957 when the area figure was 21 percent higher than the national urban median.

Of course no one need starve or freeze in the District. Relief programs feed and clothe the desperately poor. But, as the reports of the Junior Village Project Committee show, such assistance only alleviates a sickening situation. It does nothing to cure lingering disease that is poverty.

Like most other cities Washington has turned its back on the poverty that is as close as the shack in Georgetown, the dishwasher in a Connecticut Avenue restaurant, the slums within a few blocks of the Capitol. Only about half of the 11,000 families with income of less than $3,000 a year are on relief. The heads of some of these families are drunkards, thieves, malingerers, or chiselers. But many are headed by a father or mother who has steady work as a laborer, a trashman, a porter or as a domestic servant, a countergirl, a charwoman. Almost all of Washington's poor people are unskilled Negroes, many of whom came to the District from rundown rural areas in the Southeastern States.

A vast community effort is needed if Washington is to be in fact as effluent as it appears to be on the surface of its cocktail and dinner party society. The District must set up better programs to rehabilitate the heads of poverty stricken families, most of whom can be productively employed. Employers must broaden job opportunities for Negroes. Unions must open their ranks so that Negroes can learn more skills. More and better housing, public as well as private, must be made available to Negroes. Social responsibilities must be emphasized; birth control advice must be available.

There is no easy way to end poverty. But the job would not seem so difficult if it were considered in terms of the 45,000 Washington children who now live in want. The city can better afford the relatively small cost of rehabilitating the poor than to continue to pay the social and economic prices that poverty exacts.

[From the Washington Evening Star, Feb. 1, 1959]

CRIME'S BREEDING GROUND

The finding in a survey that 11,520 Washington families are trying to exist on incomes so low that survival is virtually impossible without extra means of support exposes a tragedy for the community as well as for the individuals concerned. A survey consultant has described the bleak homes of these unfortunates as breeding grounds for dependency. More alarming still, in our view, is the fact that such homes inevitably are also breeding grounds for delinquency and crime.

The "bedrock" families referred to by officials of the Health and Welfare Council of the National Capital Area have 4 minor children each and an income of less than $3,000 a year. All but 345 of the families are colored—a factor which the council points out bears on their low-income status. For there is a severe shortage in the District of jobs for "blue collar" or "no collar" workers for which many Negroes of limited education would be qualified. Adding to the income problem is the fact, revealed in the study, that many of the homes are without regular breadwinners and that many of the children are without fathers.

About half of the surveyed families were on relief. Other families had been denied public assistance because their moral standards are at marked divergence from those which are a prerequisite to public relief. To make the picture darker, the council expects the situation here to grow worse, as more "bedrock" families move into the city and more children are born. This means an ever-increasing welfare cost.

The cost of relief is relatively unimportant, however, when one views what the cost to the community will be in terms of crimes which such conditions spawn—from pocketbook snatching to armed robbery and murder. The study being conducted by the council, with funds granted by the Eugene and Agnes Meyer Foundation, may provide the incentive for—and the basis of—a concerted community effort to alleviate the shocking conditions under which so many of the city's families eke out their bare existence.

ANNA B. MAYS

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order No. 39, Senate Resolution 76, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A resolution (S. Res. 76) to pay a gratuity to Anna B. Mays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Montana.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay, from the contingent fund of the Senate, to Anna B. Mays, widow of Lewis C. Mays, an employee of the Office of the Architect of the Capitol at the time of his death, a sum equal to 6 months' compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

STUDY OF PROBLEMS OF THE AGED

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order No. 40, Senate Resolution 65.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A resolution (S. Res. 65) authorizing a comprehensive study of the problems of the aged.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Montana.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, the resolution was reported unanimously by the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and by the Committee on Rules and Administration. The chairman of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare is present.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a statement explaining the action of the committee.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The statistical evidence pointing to the growing severity of the problems of the aged are common knowledge to the members of this committee. The first and most significant information is that relating to the rapid growth of our aged population.

Where in 1900 there were 3 million persons over 65, the number over 65 in 1955 was more than 14 million. By 1975 more than 20 million Americans will be over 65. At present, in over half of our States, at least 8 percent of the population is over 65.

Compounding the problems created by this increasing percentage of aged is the poverty which evidently accompanies the aging process. Statistics compiled by this committee demonstrate that in 1954 one-half of all families whose head was over 65 had a cash income of less than $2,000. In that same year two-thirds of the individuals over 65 living alone or with nonrelatives had a cash income of less than $1,000.

Each of us on this committee has become quite aware, through our mail and through meetings with our constituents, of the human problems which are the result of the figures just quoted.

In this day of inflation and administered prices the incomes which I have cited above are self-evidently insufficient to provide even the bare necessities of life for the families involved.

Adequate medical care is an impossibility. Proper housing, diet, and clothing are almost equally hopeless. Employment, except for some forms which border on outright exploitation, is out of the question for most.

Accompanying each of these hard facts of difficult physical survival are the many blows to the hearts and souls of these people. A life of dignity can hardly be lived in the kind of housing which these incomes can purchase. Men and women who have contributed so much to our Nation should not have to finish their lives in the anonymity and despair which inevitably accompany such poverty.

It should be emphasized that problems of the aged are not related only to the indigent. A large number of our citizens over 65 who do have a somewhat more adequate income still face many difficult challenges in their later years. They, like their less fortunate neighbors, also are concerned about continuing to make a contribution. They also have leisure time which they wish to fill with some satisfying occupation. A recent article in the Reader's Digest pointed up these problems as they related to a retired college professor, and I believe the article would be of value to all who are concerned with these questions.

There is no simple answer to any of these problems. The solutions that have been offered are legion. The record of this Congress, for the past two decades, contains almost countless proposals for each and every one of the problems we have discussed.

Many of the members of this committee have offered solutions which are sound, practical, and humanitarian. But because they have been offered as a few among many, they have been lost in the legislative byways along with most of their companion measures.

The great prestige of this committee, and its chairman, can be an effective instrument for achievement in this area. A thorough and complete study by the committee, using the best men and women in the field, can perhaps result in recomendations capable of enactment.

That is why I have offered the following resolution. I should like to outline what I think would be the work of a Subcommittee on the Aged and Aging, if it is created by the committee and approved by the Senate.

The following questions should be asked:

1. What are the major problems of the aged?

2. How well are existing agencies, private and public, providing solutions for those problems?

3. Specifically, is the role of the Federal Government, as now practiced, adequate, or is there a need for additional action?

4. Are there new ideas in this field of which the public or public officials are not aware, which could, if effected, yield greater success?

5. Are the fiscal implications of otherwise sound proposals such that they can be reasonably accepted by Congress?

These, in general, would be the major areas of investigation. There are obviously a large number of precise questions which will have to be asked under each.

The first order of business for the subcommittee would be a series of hearings in Washington. First, we would like to obtain the views of a number of recognized authorities in the field of the aged. They would be brought to Washington to comprise a panel which could proceed on an informal briefing session for members of the subcommittee.

Second, officials of the Federal agencies concerned with our older citizens would be heard.

Third, representatives of organizations, private and public, similarly concerned and based in Washington, would be asked to appear.

Fourth, a number of hearings would be held in selected communities throughout the country. These communities would be selected in the degree to which they are representative of the problems of the aging. We would seek to select on the basis of geography; on the concentration of aged within the local population; on the problems represented by rural aged as contrasted to the urban industrial aged; and on other appropriate criteria.

Fifth, whatever complementary hearings necessary would be held in Washington prior to the submission of the subcommittee report.

It is anticipated that such a subcommittee would require an able and dedicated staff of its own, so as not to put an additional burden on the already busy staff of the full committee.

The budget which has been submitted contains a breakdown of the several positions which are proposed. A staff director would be appointed who would supervise the work of the subcommittee in arranging hearings both in Washington and abroad; prepare the information which would go out to interested organizations and persons; supervise the preparation of reports and recommendations; and, in general, carry out whatever policies are established by the members of the subcommittee.

In accordance with the procedures established by the Senate Rules Committee, provision has been made for the appointment of a minority staff member.

The third position will be filled by a research director who will have primary responsibility for the initial preparation of all material distributed by the subcommittee; the collating of the information and data obtained in hearings; and the initial preparation of the report of the subcommittee.

Clerical help will be provided for these staff members.

In addition, the most knowledgeable people in this field should be utilized at every opportunity. Funds are provided for consultant fees and expenses, as are funds for experts who will be asked to comprise the panel which will begin the hearings.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, these money resolutions were referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration. In that committee I opposed increasing money to be spent for investigating and study committees over the amounts approved last year. I still think there should be no increases. I offered an amendment to reduce the amounts. Most of those resolutions have been acted upon by the Senate.

I believe the impact of such resolutions upon the budget goes far beyond the amount of money directly involved, although it is a sizable sum. Such resolutions create the incubator in which big government is hatched. We add more and more staffs in the Senate. It takes more and more staffs in our offices to ascertain what those committees are doing. The Government moves farther and farther away from the people. I wish the RECORD to show my sentiments in this connection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 65) was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized under sections 134(a) and 136 of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, as amended, and in accordance with its jurisdictions specified by rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate to examine, investigate, and make a complete study of any and all matters pertaining to the problems of the aging including, but not limited to, (a) a study of the major problems of the aged, (b) a study of the existing programs of agencies, both public and private, dealing with problems of the aged, (c) a study of the present role of the Federal Government in dealing with problems of the aged, and (d) a study of any additional Federal programs which should be undertaken to help solve the problems of the aged.

SEC. 2. For the purposes of this resolution the committee, from February 1, 1959, to January 31, 1960, inclusive, is authorized (1) to make such expenditures as it deems advisable; (2) to employ upon a temporary basis, technical, clerical, and other assistants and consultants: Provided, That the minority is authorized to select one person for appointment, and the person so selected shall be appointed and his compensation shall be so fixed that his gross rate shall not be less by more than $1,200 than the highest gross rate paid to any other employee; and (3) with the prior consent of the heads of the departments or agencies concerned, and the Committee on Rules and Administration, to utilize the reimbursable services, information, facilities, and personnel of any of the departments or agencies of the Government.

SEC. 3. The committee shall report its findings, together with its recommendations for legislation as it deems advisable, to the Senate at the earliest practicable date, but not later than January 31, 1960.

SEC. 4. Expenses of the committee, under this resolution, which shall not exceed $85,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

ADDITIONAL TEMPORARY STAFF AND FUNDS FOR COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 42, Senate Resolution 45.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A resolution (S. Res. 45) to provide additional temporary staff and funds for the Committee on Public Works.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Montana.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution (S. Res. 45) to provide additional temporary staff and funds for Committee on Public Works, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Works with an amendment and subsequently reported from the Committee on Rules and Administration without an additional amendment.

The amendment of the Committee on Public Works was, on page 2, line 10, after the word "exceed", to strike out "$150,000" and insert "$125,000", so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Works, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized under sections 134 and 136 of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, as amended, and in accordance with its jurisdiction specified by rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate from February 1, 1959, to January 31, 1960, inclusive, to (1) make such expenditures as it deems advisable; (2) to employ upon a temporary basis, technical, clerical, and other assistants and consultants: Provided, That the minority is authorized to select one person for appointment, and the person so selected shall be appointed and his compensation shall be fixed that his gross rate shall not be less by more than $1,200 than the highest gross rate paid to any other employee; and (3) with the prior consent of the heads of the departments or agencies concerned, and of the Committee on Rules and Administration, to utilize the reimbursable services, information, facilities, and personnel of any departments or agencies of the Government.

SEC. 2. The expenses of the committee under this resolution, which shall not exceed $125,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a statement explaining the need for the Committee on Public Works to have the money.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

This resolution, as amended, would authorize the expenditure of $125,000 by the Committee on Public Works, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, from February 1, 1959, through January 31, 1960, to employ on a temporary basis such additional personnel as the committee deems advisable to carry out its functions during the 86th Congress.

Additional information is contained in the report of the Committee on Public Works on Senate Resolution 45 (S. Rept. 11, 86th Cong., 1st sess.). The purposes of the resolution are further detailed in a letter to Senator THOMAS C. HENNINGS, JR., chairman of the Committee on Rules and Administration, from Senator DENNIS CHAVEZ, chairman of the Committee on Public Works, which letter, with accompanying budget, is as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC WORKS,
January 27, 1959.

Hon. THOMAS C. HENNINGS, JR.,
Chairman, Committee on Rules and Administration, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: From the Committee on Public Works, on January 27, 1959, I reported Senate Resolution 45, providing additional funds for the use of the committee during the period February 1, 1959, to January 31, 1960. It is requested that your committee consider the resolution at an early date, and I respectfully urge that the committee report favorably thereon.

The need for these funds arises from the heavy and increasing workload of the committee relative to legislation under its jurisdiction. The Federal-Aid Highway Acts of 1956 and 1958 authorized a $40 billion program for the construction and improvement of the highways of the Nation, to be financed with certain Federal excise taxes on highway users which are placed in the highway trust fund. Those acts and other special acts authorized the submission of reports and studies to the Congress which are due in the near future.

In addition, the President in his budget message for fiscal year 1960 recommended certain legislation affecting the national highway program. It is necessary that there be a continuous study of the status and progress for financing and expediting completion of this huge program. These studies will require an annual review of the program and reports by the agencies, inspection of certain areas, investigation of any irregularities in prosecution of the program, conferences with highway officials and residents, study of the matter of reimbursement for cost of toll roads, study of safety problems, and consideration of any necessary amendments to the legislation in order to avoid delays in the procurement of necessary rights-of-way, equipment, material, and manpower needed for orderly prosecution of the program. The regular Federal-aid program will be carried forward and will require some preparation this year for legislation at the next session of Congress to attain this result, as well as making provision for apportionment of funds to the States for fiscal year 1962 on the basis of the estimates of costs for completing the Interstate System as submitted to the Congress by the Secretary of Commerce.

An omnibus flood control and river and harbor bill totaling $1.556 billion for 152 projects, and authorizing the inclusion of storage for water supply purposes in Federal reservoirs, was enacted during the 85th Congress. That act will add to the large backlog of previously authorized projects in the United States and its Territories, and will provide for orderly development of the Nation's water resources and contribute in a large measure to the domestic economy of the country. Since enactment of the law, 11 favorable reports on proposed projects have been transmitted to the committee, 4 reports are with the Bureau of the Budget for review, and 25 reports are with the States and Federal agencies for review and comment. Legislation has been enacted authorizing the establishment of study commissions for river basins in the southeastern States and in Texas. Prosecution of these studies will go forward. Further legislation is necessary from time to time to assist in carrying this program forward by authorizing needed individual projects or increasing basin authorizations. The program must be reviewed periodically in order to obtain up-to-date appraisals of benefits and costs, to determine the need for review and restudy of certain projects, reports, and recommendations, and the need for modification of existing projects. The committee proposes to spend a limited time in the field inspecting some of these projects and holding conferences and hearings with local citizens and organizations interested in various features of water resource development. One such field hearing is now scheduled for February 1959.

Public Law 1018, 84th Congress, amended the Watershed Protection and Flood Prevention Act, to provide for its broader use in assisting local organizations in carrying out projects for flood control and water supply purposes. Approval of plans for certain projects under this act is the responsibility of the Committee on Public Works, and will require extensive studies and investigations.

The Water Pollution Control Act amendments of 1956 authorized Federal aid in the conduct and promotion of research, investigation, experiments, demonstrations and study for eliminating and improving sanitary conditions of surface and underground waters of the United States. It also authorizes a 10-year program of Federal grants for construction of necessary treatment works for sewage or other wastes discharging into any stream. Constant review, study, and inspection of these matters by the committee will be necessary. This program has been one of the most popular and beneficial programs authorized by the committee. Although the President in his budget message proposed cessation of this program after 1960, legislation has been introduced which would broaden and increase the scope of the program. Legislation has also been introduced which would broaden and increase the program for studies in connection with the air pollution problem.

The committee approved 150 Federal buildings having an estimated aggregate cost of $750 million for prosecution under the Lease-Purchase Act of 1954. Authority for approving additional projects under that authority has expired. Some of the authorized projects are now under construction as lease-purchase projects, and others are to be constructed by direct appropriations provided by the last session of Congress. Close supervision of the program will be necessary, and additional policy established for future provision of Federal buildings, either by extension of the Lease-Purchase Act or construction by direct appropriations. In either case, project proposals would be submitted to the committee for approval.

Legislation authorizing the Tennessee Valley Authority to finance construction of additional power facilities with proceeds obtained from sale of revenue bonds passed the Senate during the 85th Congress, but did not pass the House. Similar legislation will be introduced at this session of Congress, and will require additional review and study of proposals advanced, and the prosecution of this large power program.

Legislation authorizing the establishment of a Columbia River Development Corporation to supersede the Bonneville Power Administration for administration, construction, and operation of Federal power facilities in the Pacific Northwest, was introduced in the last Congress. Hearings on the proposed legislation were held in Washington and in the field during recess. The proposed legislation will again be introduced during this Congress, and will require further hearings and extensive studies and investigations.

Nomination of members of the Board of Directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority, the Mississippi River Commission, the California Debris Commission, and the Federal Highway Administrator are referred to the committee for recommendation.

Other matters that will be considered by the Committee on Public Works requiring special studies relate to water resources development policy; navigation bridge clearances; timber-access roads on forest lands; acquisition of lands in reservoir areas; diversion of water from Lake Michigan; evaluation of recreational benefits from Federal reservoirs, cost sharing on flood control projects, reconstruction of the Alaska Highway, and amendments to the highway laws affecting Alaska; and buildings and grounds in the District of Columbia.

A division of the funds requested is as follows:

Salaries	$60,660.37
Contributions to civil service retirement fund	3,942.92
Reimbursable payments to agencies	4,000.00
Travel	33,000.00
Hearings	14,000.00
Stationery	2,000.00
Communications	3,000.00
Contingencies	4,396.71
Total	125,000.00

Your early consideration of Senate Resolution 45 will be greatly appreciated.

Sincerely yours,

DENNIS CHAVEZ,
Chairman, Committee on Public Works.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

INVESTIGATION BY COMMITTEE ON INTERIOR AND INSULAR AFFAIRS

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 43, Senate Resolution 70.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A resolution (S. Res. 70) authorizing the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs to investigate certain matters within its jurisdiction.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Montana.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a statement with respect to Senate Resolution 70, as an explanation of the need for the funds and the purposes for which designated.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

This resolution would authorize the expenditure of $200,000 by the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, from February 1, 1959 through January 31, 1960, to examine, investigate, and make a complete study of any and all matters pertaining to (1) minerals, materials, and fuels; (2) irrigation, reclamation, and power development; (3) public lands; (4) Indians; and (5) Territories and insular affairs.

The purposes of the resolution are more fully explained in a letter to Senator THOMAS C. HENNINGS, JR., chairman of the Committee on Rules and Administration, from Senator JAMES E. MURRAY, chairman of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, which letter is as follows:

U.S. SENATE, COMMITTEE ON INTERIOR AND INSULAR AFFAIRS,
February 2, 1959.

Hon. THOMAS C. HENNINGS, Jr.,
Chairman, Senate Committee on Rules and Administration, United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I have today reported to the Senate, Senate Resolution 70 which was approved by this committee unanimously last Friday. The resolution authorizes this committee to retain additional staff employees for the purpose of studying matters within the jurisdiction of this committee, and provides $200,000 for such purposes.

Enclosed for your committee's use is information relating to the manner in which we plan to budget the expenditures made under the resolution. The committee proposes to retain a total of 14 employees—the same number of employees provided for in a similar resolution enacted last year. In our budget we are maintaining our request for funds for administrative purposes at approximately the same level as was established last year. A total of $195,728.17 was appropriated for our use last year. The small increase we seek this year is needed to provide for slight adjustments in the civil service retirement contribution and other minor increases for administrative needs.

As I have pointed out, the resolution was reported from the committee unanimously All members of the committee agreed that there was a definite need for the staff members who would be retained under the resolution, and there was no objection, whatsoever, to the amount of money sought.

When this legislation is considered by your committee, I would appreciate an opportunity to appear personally before you in support of the resolution.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES E. MURRAY, Chairman.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was considered and agreed to, as follows:

(1) minerals, materials, and fuels;

(2) irrigation, reclamation, and power development;

(3) public lands;

(4) Indians;

(5) Territories and insular affairs.

STUDY OF NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACT AND LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS ACT

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 41, Senate Resolution 66.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A resolution (S. Res. 66) authorizing a study of the National Labor Relations Act and Labor-Management Relations Act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Montana.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution (S. Res. 66) authorizing a study of the National Labor Relations Act and Labor-Management Relations Act, which had been reported from the Committee on Rules and Administration with an amendment on page 2, line 13, after the word "exceed", to strike out "$10,000" and insert "$20,000", so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed under section 134(a) and 136 of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, as amended, and in accordance with its jurisdiction specified by rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate, to make a full and compete study of the provisions of the National Labor Relations Act and the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, with a view to ascertaining the extent to which changes in such Acts are desirable.

SEC. 2. For the purposes of this resolution the committee, from the date on which this resolution is agreed to to July 1, 1959, inclusive, is authorized to (1) make such expenditures as it deems advisable; (2) to employ upon a temporary basis, technical, clerical, and other assistants and consultants; and (3) with the prior consent of the heads of the departments or agencies concerned, and the Committee on Rules and Administration, to utilize the reimbursable services, information, facilities, and personnel of any of the departments or agencies of the Government.

SEC. 3. The committee shall report its findings, together with its recommendations for legislation as it deems advisable, to the Senate at the earliest practicable date, but not later than June 1, 1959.

SEC. 4. Expenses of the committee, under this resolution, which shall not exceed $20,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a statement in support of the resolution.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate Resolution 66 authorizes the committee to make a full and complete study of the provisions of the National Labor Relations Act and the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, with a view to ascertaining the extent to which changes in such acts are desirable. It provides that the committee shall report its findings, together with such recommendations for legislation it deems advisable, to the Senate not later than June 1, 1959. The sum of $20,000 is authorized for committee expenses under the resolution.

The sole purpose of the proposed resolution is to make it possible for the Subcommittee on Labor of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare to secure the services on a per diem basis of a panel of outstanding experts in the field of labor law whose task it will be to define those areas of existing labor relations law in need of revision, and to suggest to the subcommittee specific recommendations to bring about such revision. When the panel has completed its work and submitted its report to the subcommittee, it is intended that public hearings shall begin on pending bills to amend existing labor relations laws.

It is expected that the panel will meet in Washington on several occasions during the next few months, and members of the panel may also perform work in connection with their service to the committee at other times and places individually or in teams.

To compensate the members of the panel on a per diem basis for their services, and to reimburse them for their expenses during meetings of the panel in Washington, Senate Resolution 66 would provide the sum of $20,000. This sum would also provide secretarial and other services needed by the panel.

A proposed budget is attached hereto.

In view of the fact that no part of the funds sought under Senate Resolution 66 would be used by the committee for the employment of additional professional staff personnel, it has not been thought necessary to include any provision for selection of a staff member by the minority. I would further call the attention to the fact that the study would be terminated by June 1 of this year.

On behalf of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, may I earnestly request early action and favorable consideration of Senate Resolution 66.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

INVESTIGATION OF TEXTILE INDUSTRY

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 44, Senate Resolution 50.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A resolution (S. Res. 50) authorizing the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to investigate the textile industry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Montana.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a statement in explanation of the resolution.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

This resolution would authorize the expenditure of not to exceed $2,500 by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce from February 1, 1959, through March 31, 1959, to conclude its investigation of the factors affecting commerce and production in the textile industry of the United States, which was initiated pursuant to Senate Resolution 287 of the 85th Congress, 2d session, agreed to May 6, 1958.

The purposes of this resolution are more fully detailed in a letter to Senator THOMAS C. HENNINGS, JR., chairman of the Committee on Rules and Administration, from Senator WARREN G. MAGNUSON, chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which letter is as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE,
January 28, 1959.

HON. THOMAS C. HENNINGS, JR.
Chairman, Committee on Rules and Administration, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Senate Resolution 50, now before your committee for consideration and action, would authorize the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to spend not more than $2,500 between February 1 and March 31, 1959, upon a study of all factors affecting commerce and production in the textile industry of the United States.

Pursuant to section 102(j) of the Legislative Reorganization Act, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has general jurisdiction over interstate and foreign commerce. It is a recognized fact that the entire domestic textile industry has been in a depressed and declining condition for several years. Many factors have been advanced as the causes of the decline, but there has never been an exhaustive and definitive study to clearly establish the nature of the industry problems in order to form a basis for corrective action.

Inasmuch as the textile industry is clearly involved in both interstate and foreign commerce, the Senate Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee believes that it has the prime responsibility for ascertaining the nature of the industry's problems.

It was because of the foregoing that last year we requested, and both your committee and the Senate approved, funds in the amount of $25,000 for a textile inquiry. Pursuant to Senate Resolution 287, 85th Congress, the special subcommittee, headed by Senator PASTORE, held hearings in Washington, D.C., Providence, R.I., Hartford, Conn., Concord, N.H., Clemson, S.C., Charlotte, N.C., and New York City. Over 200 witnesses were heard.

The subcommittee has not exhausted its funds, but is running out of time. Of the $25,000 authorized last year, approximately $17,000 is unused and will be returned. The work is nearing completion, but additional time after January 31, 1959, together with available funds, will be needed. The $2,500 requested by this resolution will enable us to complete the work.

We do not contemplate hiring staff, but will continue the employment of the special consultant until the report is completed and approved. Accordingly, no budget is attached.

We believe this to be a modest request, both as to time and money, and urge your approval.

Sincerely yours,
WARREN G. MAGNUSON,
Chairman.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized under sections 134(a) and 136 of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, as amended, to conduct a full and complete study of all factors affecting commerce and production in the textile industry of the United States, including but not limited to (a) the extent, nature, and causes of the decline in interstate and foreign commerce in textile mill products; (b) the decline in employment in the textile industry; (c) the effects of policies and programs of the Federal Government on the industry; and (d) the impact of commercial policies of other nations on the industry.

SEC. 2. For the purposes of this resolution, the committee, from February 1, 1959, to March 31, 1959, inclusive, is authorized (1) to make such expenditures as it deems advisable; (2) to employ, upon a temporary basis, technical, clerical, and other assistants and consultants: Provided, That the minority is authorized to select one person for appointment, and the person so selected shall be appointed and his compensation shall be so fixed that his gross rate shall not be less by more than $1,200 than the highest gross rate paid to any other employee; and (3) with the prior consent of the heads of the departments or agencies concerned, and the Committee on Rules and Administration, to utilize the reimbursable services, information, facilities, and personnel of any of the departments or agencies of the Government.

SEC. 3. The committee shall report its findings, together with its recommendations for legislation as it deems advisable, to the Senate at the earliest practicable date, but not later than March 31, 1959.

SEC. 4. Expenses of the committee under this resolution, which shall not exceed $2,500, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR FILING REPORT BY THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON PRESERVATION OF MEMORABILIA OF THE SENATE

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 45, Senate Resolution 72.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A resolution (S. Res. 72) extending the time for filing a report by the Special Committee on Preservation of Memorabilia of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Montana.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a brief explanation of the resolution.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Pursuant to Senate Resolution 318 of the 85th Congress, 2d session, agreed to on July 28, 1958, a special committee of the Senate was established to make a study for the purpose of determining the desirability and feasibility of providing an appropriate means of preserving selected documents, records, and memorabilia of the U.S. Senate having historical significance or value. Senators ANDERSON, BENNETT, CASE of South Dakota, MANSFIELD, and TALMADGE have been appointed to the special committee.

This resolution continues the authority of the special committee and extends the time by which it shall report the results of its study, together with such recommendations as it deems appropriate, to the Senate, from February 1, 1959, until April 2, 1959.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That S. Res. 318, Eighty-fifth Congress, establishing a special committee of the Senate to study and report with respect to preserving memorabilia of the Senate, is amended by striking out "February 1" in section 4 and inserting in lieu thereof "April 2".

CONFERENCE OF WEST VIRGINIA REPRESENTATIVES WITH SECRETARY OF COMMERCE LEWIS L. STRAUSS REGARDING IMPORTS OF CHEAP FOREIGN RESIDUAL OIL

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, earlier today members of the West Virginia delegation in the Congress, including the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. BYRD], myself, and six other Members, had a conference with Lewis L. Strauss, the Secretary of Commerce of the United States.

I invite attention of Senators to the capacity in which Mr. Strauss serves as Chairman of the Cabinet Committee on Oil Imports.

We presented the story of the dire distress of the people of West Virginia, which has been brought about at least to a certain degree by the impact of imports of cheap foreign residual oil upon the West Virginia coal industry. This is a problem which is not peculiar to West Virginia alone, but exists also in other coal-producing sections of the country.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that excerpts from the remarks presented by the Senator from West Virgina [Mr. BYRD] and myself be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXCERPTS FROM REMARKS BY U.S. SENATOR JENNINGS RANDOLPH AND U.S. SENATOR ROBERT C. BYRD, OF WEST VIRGINIA, FEBRUARY 6, 1959, AT CONFERENCE WITH SECRETARY OF COMMERCE LEWIS L. STRAUSS, RE IMPACT OF IMPORTS OF CHEAP FOREIGN RESIDUAL OIL UPON THE WEST VIRGINIA AND DOMESTIC U.S. COAL INDUSTRY

These remarks are addressed to you, sir, for consideration in the several capacities in which you serve the Government of the United States in matters relating to domestic and foreign commerce, but, especially, as the Chairman of the Cabinet Committee on Oil Imports.

On February 3, 1959, Senator BYRD and I pointed out to you in a joint letter and supplemental telegram that we represent the largest coal-producing State—one which is suffering adversity in an inordinate degree as a result of a sharp decline in coal production, marketing and employment.

A known factor inducing these conditions is the economic impact of the ever-increasing importation of cheap foreign residual oil.

The consequences—vast unemployment and poverty over much of West Virginia and in other coal-producing areas—would be sufficient in themselves to cause us to make these observations and representations.

But there is an additional aspect of the plight of the coal industry, the railroads, and the thousands of unemployed who would—under more favorable circumstances—earn their livelihood through toil in the mines and by the railroads, especially.

We refer, in this instance, to the regressive effects of a distressed coal industry upon the national defense—and this is a factor of real concern not only to West Virginians, but, indeed, to the Nation as a whole, and to the free world.

The steady decline of the coal industry and the increasing proportions of the resultant unemployment problem must be ameliorated in the interest of humanity from the economic and social standpoints. And, from the aspect of human survival under present troubled world conditions, steps must be taken promptly to remove inequitable impediments to revival of this industry so important to national security.

America and the free world can ill afford to permit our most basic natural resource fuel source to languish in a state of deterioration—nor can we permit the labor force of the great coal industry to be dissipated. Yet, Mr. Chairman, these conditions are, in fact, being accentuated by our Government's unresponsiveness to the dangers inherent in the virtually unchecked importation of cheap foreign residual oil.

We appreciate your attention to the foregoing statement of the basic problem—and the West Virginia delegation in the Congress considers it to be a foreboding one.

On February 26, 1955, the Presidential Advisory Committee on Energy Supplies and Resources Policy reported to the President, among other of its recommendations and observations, that, and I quote, "An expanding domestic oil industry, plus a healthy oil industry in friendly countries which help to supply the U.S. market, constitute basically important elements in the kind of industrial strength which contributes most to a strong national defense."

But, Mr. Chairman, that same report, issued 4 years ago, also included this statement which we must now emphasize—and again I quote:

"Other energy sources, especially coal, must also maintain a level of operation which will make possible rapid expansion in output, should that become necessary. In this complex picture both domestic production and imports have important parts to play; neither should be sacrificed to the other."

It is submitted by those of us especially concerned with the situation that coal production and the facilities for coal expansion are not being enabled, by current market conditions, to be maintained at a level which will make possible rapid output increases, should they become essential to the national security. In fact, the opposite is true.

Production levels are insufficient to permit facilities for future output to be maintained adequately, let alone to make provision for rapid expansion in a period of national emergency.

It seems pertinent to cite further that the 1955 report of the Presidential advisory committee noted even then that "since World War II importation of crude oil and residual fuel oil into the United States has increased substantially, with the result that today these oils supply a significant part of the U.S. market for fuels."

We would point out, Mr. Chairman, that the average daily import of residual oil in 1954, when the committee made the observation just quoted, was slightly over 400,000 barrels.

If daily imports of 400,000 barrels of crude and residual oil in 1954 constituted "a significant part of the U.S. market for fuels," wouldn't the January 1959 daily average importation of 800,000 barrels of crude and residual oil properly be termed doubly significant?

Obviously recognizing the danger of steady increases in crude and residual oil imports on the domestic fuels markets—as well as the ability of the domestic fuels industries to remain healthy in the face of such increased imports—the Presidential advisory committee, in 1955, made these cogent observations and recommendations—and I again quote:

"The committee believes that if the imports of crude and residual oils should exceed significantly the respective proportions that these imports of oil bore to the production of domestic crude oil in 1954, the domestic fuels situation could be so impaired as to endanger the orderly industrial growth which assures the military and civilian supplies and reserves that are necessary to the national defense. There would be inadequate incentive for exploration and the discovery of new sources of supply.

"In view of the foregoing, the committee concludes that, in the interest of national defense, imports should be kept in the balance recommended above."

But the committee unfortunately recommended, too, that "it is highly desirable that this be done by voluntary, individual action of those who are importing or those who become importers of crude or residual oil. The committee believes that every effort should be made and will be made to avoid the necessity of governmental intervention. The committee recommends, however, that if in the future the imports of crude oil and residual fuel oil exceed significantly the respective proportions that such imported oils bore to domestic production of crude oil in 1954, appropriate action should be taken."

It is submitted further, Mr. Chairman, that there is a decided imbalance between domestic production and importation of residual oil. The imbalance acutely relates to domestic coal production.

In 1954, coal output dropped to the low level of approximately 390 million tons, and in that same year residual oil imports were 129 million barrels. There was a gradual improvement in coal production to a 1956 output of 500 million tons, but importation of residual oil increased at the same time to 163 million barrels that year. Since 1956, however, coal production steadily declined back to 400 million tons in 1958, but residual oil influx from abroad climbed to 173 million barrels at the same time.

The imbalance as relates to coal production versus residual oil importations is best reflected in statistics for the month of January of this year, to wit:

Coal output dropped 2½ million tons below the January 1958 level—a decline of a half-million tons a week. Residual oil imports, at the same time, jumped to 800,000 barrels per day as compared with 555,000 barrels per day in January 1958, almost a 50-percent increase, while coal suffered the consequences cited, namely, a decline of a half-million tons per week.

Coal's two poorest production years since World War II—1954 and 1958—marked the lowest ebb in tonnage output since 1910. That the impact of residual oil imports upon domestic coal markets had a direct bearing on these conditions is an incontrovertable fact.

The time for action to fulfill the recommendations of the Presidential Advisory Committee as set forth in that Committee's 1955 report is now.

Obviously, the Committee's suggested voluntary plan of keeping imports and domestic fuels production in balance—tried over a 4-year period—has been a miserable failure. The governmental intervention it recommended by inference as an expediency to be resorted to when imports of crude oil and residual fuel oil exceeded significantly the proportions that such imported oils bore to domestic production in 1954 now seems to be necessary.

Indeed, because the present administration's program of voluntary import controls has not worked and will not work, there seems to be an open invitation—even to Iron Curtain countries such as Rumania—to ship cheap foreign residual oil into this country.

This condition not only is destroying domestic markets for American coal—it is likewise creating intolerable conditions for American railroads—and is depriving American coal miners, American railroaders, and many other American workers in allied occupations of their livelihood.

Unless strong recommendations are made to the President by your committee, Mr. Chairman, to control imports of residual oil on a mandatory basis pursuant to the authority vested in his office by section 8 of the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1958, serious consequences will occur.

Increased imports of residual oil above the 1958 levels would further damage the coal industry and do irreparable damage to the national security by further discommoding that industry, its level of production, and its ability to expand in time of emergency.

Governments of other countries are taking actions to protect their own indusrties—West Germany, by imposition of a tariff of $4.76 per ton on coal imports—or to exploit American and other producers doing business therein—such as the Venezuelan hike in royalties.

It is imperative that the Government of the United States afford its domestic industries right and proper consideration.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, it is urged that the Cabinet Committee on Oil Imports and the Presidential Advisory Committee on Energy Supplies and Resources Policy strongly recommend to the President that he proceed under his existing authority to adjust and regulate the imports of residual oil by fixing mandatory quotas so that such imports will not threaten to impair the national security. To do so would make unnecessary the resort to other time-consuming and exhaustive inquiries under cumbersome procedures and thereby would enhance the national security and undoubtedly would improve economic and social conditions in depressed coal-producing areas.

Or, as an alternative, it would be appropriate for the committees to recommend to the President that he freeze imports of residual oil temporarily, according to a suitable formula—such as that recommended in 1955 by the Presidential Advisory Committee—so that the levels of imports cannot be increased in the interim period while the Office of Defense Mobilization conducts an appropriate investigation under provisions of section 8 of the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1958.

There are overriding economic, social, and national defense reasons why one or the other of these urgently needed actions should be recommended to the President and implemented by him with a minimum of delay.

A CONSTRUCTIVE CIVIL RIGHTS PROGRAM

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, with the administration's civil-rights program now before Congress, along with the proposals that others of us have made, the essential national discussion and deliberation can proceed.

I sincerely hope that this process of education, analysis, debate, and decision can be carried on in a spirit of good will and with a determination to find and adopt constructive measures for equal justice. The problem is a national, not merely sectional, one. Epithets, recriminations, and name calling will serve no useful purpose. We need the best thought of all groups to reach a workable and meaningful result. With such friendly cooperation I believe we can make substantial progress.

The Washington Post on Monday, February 2, before the President's message, in an editorial entitled "Aid, Not Carpetbaggery," made thoughtful comments on the bill, S. 810, which 16 other Members of the Senate joined me in sponsoring. In a letter of the same date to the editor I made a somewhat extended reply to the criticisms of the bill.

One of those criticisms was leveled at the inclusion in our bill of authority for the Attorney General to file injunction suits to end the denials of equal protection of the laws. And in justifying the exclusion of this proposal from the administration's program, which had included such authority in 1957, Attorney General Rogers has repeated this argument. The editor and the Attorney General assert that the recent developments in Virginia, commencing at long last the process of desegregation, justify withholding such legislative proposals for injunction suits by the Attorney General at this time. I greatly regret this decision and believe that the omission of this authority is the major defect in the administration's plan.

In my letter to the Post, I have set forth the answers to this argument, namely, that the very procedures which have finally succeeded in making some progress in Virginia—injunction suits, with all the protections of court proceedings, reviews, and appeals—are what would be made possible under the provisions in our bill which are based on the same principles as part III of the Civil Rights Act of 1957.

Mr. President, I do not mean to argue that point now, but because it is such a central point of difference between the administration's proposal and that which 17 Senators have introduced, and because my letter to the editor sets forth the supporting argument to a degree where it could not be fully printed in the Post, itself, I ask unanimous consent that the Post editorial and my original letter in reply be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial and letter were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Feb. 2, 1959]

AID, NOT CARPETBAGGERY

The Senate will soon be confronted by three major civil rights bills—those submitted by Senators JOHNSON and DOUGLAS and the administration's bill. In these circumstances it is not to be supposed that any one of them will be passed as submitted. Rather, the Judiciary Committee will be expected to draw from each its best and most timely provisions. In this process the Douglas bill introduced on Thursday will have a good deal to contribute.

In some respects the most important section of the Douglas bill is its sympathetic references to the Supreme Court's desegregation decisions and its general underwriting of a policy of equal protection of the laws in the United States. We think Congress would be well advised to write into whatever civil rights bill it may pass this year a philosophical endorsement of desegregation as a policy representing national ideals. Congress should not leave wholly to the courts the proclamation of the profound American belief in equal protection of the laws.

The Douglas bill would also authorize the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare to offer technical assistance and financial aid to States, cities, and school districts that are struggling with desegregation problems. Specialists in the problems of desegregation could be hired and assigned to local schools. Additional teachers and buildings could also be provided if necessary to speed up the adjustment to equality in the schools.

Unfortunately, however, the Douglas bill does not stop there. It sweeps on to authorize the HEW to draw up desegregation plans for communities failing to act on their own initiative. Such plans could then be imposed on the reluctant communities through court injunctions. This sort of carpetbaggery would produce more sectional hostility than desegregation. It looks in precisely the opposite direction from Senator JOHNSON's proposed conciliation agency.

Nor do we think the time has come to give the Attorney General authority to seek enforcement of all civil rights through use of the injunction. Recent events in Virginia indicate that the barriers to desegregation are beginning to crumble. The processes of peaceful adjustment might be gravely upset by undue haste in the application of force from Washington. The wisdom of moving a step at a time in this delicate situation and of converting instead of bludgeoning has been too well demonstrated to be seriously challenged.

LETTER OF SENATOR PAUL H. DOUGLAS TO THE WASHINGTON POST

FEBRUARY 2, 1959.

EDITOR, LETTERS TO THE EDITOR COLUMN,
Washington Post and Times Herald,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: Reasoned analysis and widespread public discussion are prime essentials in arriving at a workable approach to desegregation and full compliance with the Constitution and decrees of the Supreme Court. Your editorial on "Aid, Not Carpetbaggery" (Washington Post, Feb. 2, 1959), is a long step in this direction and is a welcome contrast to the more superficial treatment, vituperation or indifference with which such proposals have been met in the past.

To clarify the issues, however, and to correct some misunderstandings about our proposal, may I be permitted to make a few comments on your analysis.

First, I am proud of the civil rights bill which I introduced last week, and I am glad that it bears my name. But it also bears the names of 16 other Senators as cosponsors, including many of the best known and most thoughtful and reasonable advocates of a sane approach to progress in the field of human relations. A number of these Senators gave important help in the drafting of this measure, and it is therefore truly a joint product. A dozen or more House Members, including Judge CELLER, chairman of the Judiciary Committee, have sponsored the same measure. The credit—or blame—for the proposal is therefore shared by these other Members as well.

We are naturally gratified that the Post recognizes the constructive character of that part of our bill which undergirds the desegregation decisions of the Supreme Court by a statement of supporting congressional policy. Your support is also welcome for our rather comprehensive authorizations of technical assistance and financial aid through the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare to the States and localities seeking to work out their desegregation problems.

Your criticisms of the proposed authorization to HEW to draw up and issue desegregation plans as being too hasty and sweeping, however, seem to us to reflect an inadequate understanding of what is proposed.

Title IV of our bill which sets up this administrative action first requires HEW to make every effort to persuade the States and local districts to make a start toward eliminating segregation in public education, utilizing the aids and financial assistance previously referred to. It thus first emphasizes the procedure of conciliation, which you endorse, but specifies that it shall be conciliation with the aim of bringing compliance with the Constitution.

Secondly, in preparing such tentative plans the Secretary is required to seek the advice and assistance of public officials, private organizations and private citizens in the area and of any * * * advisory council.

In the third place, the proposal specifies that such tentative plans shall take into account the need of the particular area for time to make an orderly adjustment and transition from segregated to desegregated schools.

In the fourth place, if the plan thus formulated meets with the approval of the locality and is adopted by it, a beginning can be made, and the various other forms of assistance can be brought into play.

In the fifth place, however, if the tentative plan is not accepted, the Secretary must set up a public hearing upon the plan, and at this hearing, the local authorities, private organizations and private citizens shall be permitted to participate. Only after all of these steps have been taken is the Secretary authorized to prepare and issue an approved plan for desegregation. The detailed requirements for local participation in our opinion make it clear that your rather captious characterization of "carpetbaggery" is wholly unwarranted.

But, finally, it is important to recall that these desegregation plans, if still resisted, cannot come into effect until the Attorney General files an injunction suit and the court, after listening to all of the evidence and hearing arguments, issues its decree in line with the underlying decisions of the Supreme Court requiring all deliberate speed. The trial court's determination is further subject to appeal and review right up to the Supreme Court.

The bill thus seeks to use the assistance and advice of executive and administrative agencies and the experience, recommendations and criticisms of the local community in affirmatively formulating desegregation plans. In similar circumstances of bitter-end resistance under the present law, such plans have to be developed solely by the courts in injunction suits brought by the aggrieved persons in behalf of their children. But the proposed plans under our bill would in no case have any legal effect until they had gone through the judicial processes of court hearings and decision, with full right of review. The procedure is not unlike that now provided to secure compliance with NLRB recommendations.

Surely this accepted, reasonable, and deliberate procedure cannot fairly be characterize as a "force" plan, as your news reports have described it, or "bludgeoning" as you editorially refer to it.

In opposing our proposal to authorize the Attorney General to seek injunctions to end denials of equal protection of the laws, you cite with favor the recent events in Virginia. But what has brought about—at long last—the "crumbling" of the barriers of segregation and the "peaceful adjustment" which you herald there? Clearly, it is a series of court decisions, in cases initiated by individuals. The patient, thoroughly argued, long-drawn-out legal proceedings and decrees have been the path to progress in that State.

But what is the ultimate sanction under our bill? The answer is again court actions. These could, however, be initiated by the Attorney General. But in this case they must be preceded either (a) by the lengthy HEW procedure I have outlined above, or (b) by the signed complaint of individuals and a determination by the Attorney General that those individuals are unable to seek the effective legal protections for themselves. The injunctive procedure authorized in our bill is thus basically the same as the procedure under which progress is being made in Virginia, except that under carefully specified conditions the Attorney General may file the suit.

Why is it necessary that the Attorney General be empowered to initiate these procedures which can now be initiated only by individuals? This is necessary because without it the weakest, the poorest, and those most subject to intimidation or coercion are required to fight their case with their own resources against all the legal talent, power, legislation, and economic resources which a State opposed to desegregation can throw into the breach. Because of the antibarratry laws, the anti-NAACP laws, school placement laws, and the multitude of other barriers thrown up to resist the law of the land, the scales of justice can only be evenly matched if these legal and economic burdens of enforcement are borne in part by the Federal Government, whose duty it is to enforce the law of the land. To require—as is now the case—that this burden be placed solely on the backs of the fathers and mothers of Negro children in areas which are overwhelmingly hostile to them is to apply that concept of justice made famous by Anatole France's remark that the law in its majestic equality forbids the rich as well as the poor to sleep under bridges, to beg in the streets, and to steal bread.

This injunction procedure is not unique or extreme, for, as I have said in the Senate, it is now so commonplace that it is provided in 39 other laws to bring compliance with various Federal statutes, including the voting rights bill of 1957. This procedure is necessarily coupled with all the usual protections of the exercise of the equity powers of the courts and subject to all of the normal appeals in the higher courts. It has been twice approved in school cases by overwhelming votes in the House of Representatives, once in 1956 by a vote of 279 to 126, and again in 1957, by a vote of 286 to 126 in favor of the so-called part III of the civil rights bills of 1956 and 1957.

If the Attorney General sought to move faster than the Supreme Court decisions provide, the Federal judge would deny or modify his request. Thus, there are adequate safeguards through the Federal district courts and judges—almost all of whom in southern areas are southern born—against "undue haste in the application of force from Washington."

The inadequacy of the conciliation proposal by Senator JOHNSON, which you endorse, is that if the dominant forces of the community refuse to restore peaceful relations in accordance with the Constitution, the Federal Government would then lack the authority to initiate court cases to bring compliance. This failure could invite nullification and the ultimate breakdown of the Constitution.

The sponsors of our bill earnestly hope that the affirmative approaches which provide congressional backing for the Court's decrees, technical assistance, financial aid, etc., will be largely effective in getting the movement toward desegregation off deadcenter and demonstrating to the world that we intend to live by our principles of equal justice. But in the background, just as the historic decisions of the Court have been the firm rock upon which we have now begun to break away in both the North and the South from our previous discriminatory practices, so do we believe that the ultimate possibility of an appeal to the courts, initiated by the Attorney General, will be helpful in winning acceptance for these constitutional principles all along the line.

Sincerely yours,

PAUL H. DOUGLAS.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, the New York Times this morning printed a very useful comparison of the civil rights programs introduced by the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], by the administration, and by the Senators who joined with me in introducing S. 810. We believe this comparison will be useful for those who are studying these three measures. I would, however, note one minor omission: In its summary paragraph concerning "Obstruction of Justice," the Times report states that there is no similar provision in the Douglas bill making it a crime to obstruct Federal court school desegregation orders. This statement is literally true. But our bill, S. 810, does include a provision in section 602, which is not mentioned in the summary, which authorizes the Attorney General to commence injunction suits against persons who seek to obstruct Federal, State or local officials in desegregation situations, or to hinder the execution of court orders in such cases. Our bill, in other words, does include a proposal for preventive, rather than punitive, action against such obstruction.

Because of the value of this comparison in general, I ask unanimous consent that it be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A COMPARISON OF CIVIL RIGHTS PROGRAMS

(WASHINGTON, February 5.—Following is a comparative analysis of provisions of the three principal civil rights proposals before Congress. They are the administration plan submitted today, a bill introduced by the Senate majority leader, LYNDON B. JOHNSON of Texas, and a measure sponsored by Senator PAUL H. DOUGLAS, Democrat of Illinois, and 16 other Senate liberals.)

SUPPORT OF SUPREME COURT

The administration proposal includes a declaration of policy that the Supreme Court's 1954 decision declaring public school segregation unconstitutional "is the supreme law of the land," that States must take steps to end segregation and that the Federal Government is prepared to help solve their serious financial and educational problems.

The Douglas bill includes language expressly approving, in stronger terms, Supreme Court decisions outlawing segregation in schools, transportation and recreation.

The Johnson bill contains no such provisions.

FEDERAL AID

The administration and Douglas proposals provide for financial aid to help southern communities desegregate, and for technical assistance by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare on desegregation plans and in conferring on racial problems.

The administration bill is limited to the next 2 fiscal years.

The Johnson bill contains no similar provision.

VOTING RECORDS

The administration bill requires State voting registrars to maintain their records for 3 years and empowers the Justice Department to obtain such records under orders from any Federal district court.

The Johnson bill permits subpenaing of voting records under orders by special three-judge district courts.

The Douglas bill contains no provision of this kind.

CIVIL RIGHTS COMMISSION

Senator JOHNSON would extend the life of the Civil Rights Commission to January 1961.

The administration would extend it to September 1961.

The Douglas bill does not cover this subject.

BOMBING

The Johnson bill makes it a Federal crime to transmit explosives in interstate commerce for the purpose of damaging a business, educational, religious, charitable or civic building.

The administration proposal makes it a Federal crime to cross State lines in flight from prosecution for bombing a religious or educational building.

The subject is not covered in the Douglas bill.

CHILDREN OF MILITARY PERSONNEL

The administration plan provides that when a public school serving children of military personnel is closed to avoid integration, the Federal Government may provide schooling on the military base or may take the closed school from the State and operate it if it was built in whole or part with Federal funds, paying the State rent in keeping with the State's investment.

The Johnson and Douglas bills contain no such provisions.

OBSTRUCTION OF JUSTICE

The administration proposal makes it a crime for any person, private or official to obstruct a Federal court school desegregation order by threats or force.

No similar provision is in the Johnson or Douglas bills.

DISCRIMINATION IN EMPLOYMENT

The administration proposes that Congress create a commission on equal job opportunity under Government contracts, similar to a committee now set up by Executive order to try to persuade companies with Government contracts to hire without regard to race, creed or color. No such provision is in the Johnson or Douglas bills.

FEDERAL DESEGREGATION PLANS

The Douglas bill empowers the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare to draw up local desegregation plans when a community refuses to do itself.

The administration and Johnson proposals include no such power.

SUITS BY GOVERNMENT

The Douglas bill empowers the Attorney General to initiate lawsuits to end any unconstitutional discrimination against individuals in schooling or other matters when the affected individuals are found unable, for fear of reprisal or other reasons, to sue for themselves. He also allows the Government to intervene in private civil rights suits.

The administration and Johnson plans include no such proposal.

CONCILIATION

Senator JOHNSON would set up a Federal community relations service to conciliate school segregation and other racial disputes.

Neither the administration nor the Douglas bill proposes such a provision.

S. 1002—A NEW APPROACH TO LABOR LEGISLATION

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, growing out of more than 2 years of experiences with the so-called McClellan committee, the Senate Committee To Investigate Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field, I have developed, after consultation with many authorities in this field, a somewhat new approach to labor legislation, insofar as this session of Congress is concerned. I am introducing today a bill to establish standards protecting the rights of rank and file members of labor organizations by providing democratic procedures in the election of officers and delegates of such organizations; the protection of funds created from dues and assessments collected from members; the safeguarding of their rights of self-determinations; and for other purposes.

A part of the genesis of this bill comes from the fact that our committee has now received well over 150,000 letters dealing with the problems coming before our committee. I have read a great many of those letters, and have had members of our staff read a great many more. The vast majority of them come from rank and file union members themselves, saying, in one way or another, substantially the following: "Give us the tools and we will clean up our own unions."

I believe that the proposed legislation which I am introducing at this time would give to rank and file members of labor unions the tools required to clean up unions which require correction.

The proposed legislation is in the nature of a bill of rights for dues-paying members of our American labor unions.

It is in the nature of a code of correct behavior for union officials enjoying the authority of labor leadership.

In a body such as ours, and in a country such as ours, which recognizes that there is a place for trade unionism in our American democracy, the proposed legislation provides the parallel axiom, that in trade unionism also there is a place for American democracy. I think the rules should work both ways.

Judging from the tenor, character, and contents of the tens of thousands of letters received from dues-paying members of unions, I know that there is a large body of opinion within the unions to the effect that more of the principles of American democracy must be permitted to function in our trade union movement.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks the bill which I now send to the desk for appropriate reference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 1002) to establish standards protecting the rights of rank and file members of labor organizations by providing democratic procedures in the election of officers and delegates of such organizations; the protection of funds created from dues and assessments collected from members; the safeguarding of their rights of self-determination; and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. MUNDT, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) the constitution of every labor organization engaged in an industry affecting commerce shall provide that its principal officers and the members of its executive board or similar governing body shall be elected not less often than, in the case of a national or international labor organization, once every four years, and, in the case of a local labor organization, once every three years, and that any such election, and any election of delegates to any national or international convention, shall be held in accordance with the following requirements and procedures:

(1) No individual shall be a candidate who has not been nominated by a petition containing the signatures of a number of members of such organization who were members in good standing at the time their signatures were affixed to the petition, which number shall be equal to not less than two per centum of the total number of members of such labor organization who were members in good standing on the date which precedes by one hundred and twenty days the date of the election in which such individual is a candidate.

(2) No individual shall be a candidate who by reason of conviction of any offense against the laws of the United States or of any State is ineligible to vote in elections held under the laws of the State of his legal residence.

(3) Any such petition shall be filed with the secretary of such labor organization not sooner than ninety days nor later than thirty days prior to the date of such election, and such secretary shall provide each individual who is nominated by any such petition with a signed statement acknowledging the receipt of the petition pursuant to which he has been nominated.

(4) As soon as practicable after the expiration of the period during which such petitions may be filed with such secretary, such secretary shall certify to all members of the labor organization who are members in good standing, by mail directed to the last known address of each such member, the names of the various individuals who have been duly nominated for the various offices to be filled in the forthcoming election.

(5) Immediately following the making of the certifications provided for in paragraph (4), such secretary shall proceed to establish an election committee to be composed as follows: one member for each of the individuals duly nominated for office in the forthcoming election, such member to be designated by such individual in a statement signed by such individual and filed with such secretary. No individual shall be eligible to serve as a member of an election committee who is not, at the time he is appointed or designated to serve on such committee, a member in good standing of the labor organization, who at such time is an officer or employee of the labor organization or any other labor organization of which such labor organization is an affiliate or constituent unit, or who is a nominee for an office to be filled in the forthcoming election. If the number of eligible individuals designated to serve as members of the election committee is less than six, then the individuals who are members of the election committee shall select such additional eligible individuals to serve as members of the committee as may be necessary in order that such committee shall consist of six members. The election committee shall select one of its members as chairman.

(6) It shall be the duty of the election committee to supervise the conduct of the election, to advise the members of the labor organization of the time and place the election is to be held, to count the ballots and to certify to the membership of the labor organization the results thereof, and to preserve for not less than one year the ballots cast in, and other records maintained in connection with, the election.

(7) Voting in such elections shall be by secret, printed ballots, which shall be prepared by the election committee. Ballots may be cast through the use of first-class mail service if the election committee so provides.

(b) If within sixty days after such an election is held, or if no election has been held, after the date an election was required to have been held under the provisions of subsection (a), there is filed with the Secretary of Labor (hereinafter referred to as the "Secretary") a petition containing the signatures of a number of members of the labor organization who were members in good standing at the time their signatures were affixed to the petition, which number shall be equal to not less than 2 per centum of the total number of members of such labor organization who were members in good standing on the date such election was held or was so required to have been held, alleging that the constitution of such labor organization does not comply with the requirements contained in subsection (a), or that requirements of such constitution have not been complied with, the Secretary shall immediately proceed to investigate such allegation and, if he finds probable cause to believe that such allegation is true and that, if an election has been held, the failure to comply with the requirements contained in subsection (a) has had a substantial effect on the outcome of the election, he shall immediately bring a civil action against the labor organization as an entity in the district court of the United States for the district in which such labor organization maintains its principal office to set aside the election and to direct the conduct of a new election under the supervision of the Secretary and in accordance with the requirements contained in subsection (a) and such rules and regulations as the Secretary may prescribe. The service of summons, subpena, or other legal process of a court of the United States upon an officer or agent of a labor organization in his capacity as such shall constitute service upon the labor organization.

(c) If, upon a preponderance of the evidence after a trial upon the merits, the court finds—

(1) that an election has not been held within the time prescribed by subsection (a), or

(2) that the violation of the requirements contained in subsection (a) substantially affected the outcome of the election, the court shall declare the election, if any, to be void and direct the conduct of a new election under the supervision of the Secretary and, so far as lawful and practicable, in conformity with the constitution and bylaws of the labor organization. The Secretary shall promptly certify to the court the names of the persons elected and the court shall thereupon enter a decree declaring such persons to be the officers of the labor organization.

(d) An order directing an election, dismissing a complaint, or designating elected officers of a labor organization shall be appealable in the same manner as the final judgment in a civil action, but an order directing an election shall not be stayed pending appeal.

(e) If the court declares an election to be void after a trial on the merits, it shall have power to take appropriate steps to preserve and safeguard the assets of the organization pending the selection of officers.

(f) For the purpose of any investigation provided for in this section, the provisions of sections 9 and 10 (relating to the attendance of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents) of the Federal Trade Commission Act of September 16, 1914, as amended (15 U.S.C. 49, 50), are hereby made applicable to the jurisdiction, powers, and duties of the Secretary of Labor or any officers designated by him.

(g) As used in this section—

(1) "Commerce" means trade, traffic, commerce, transportation, transmission, or communication among the several States or between any State and any place outside thereof. For the purposes of this paragraph, "State" includes any State of the United States, the District of Columbia, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, American Samoa, Guam, Wake Island, the Canal Zone, and the Outer Continental Shelf lands defined in the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act (ch. 345, 67 Stat. 462).

(2) An activity or industry "affecting commerce" means any activity or industry in commerce or in which a labor dispute would hinder or obstruct commerce or the free flow of commerce, and includes any activity or industry "affecting commerce" within the meaning of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, as amended.

(3) "Labor organization" means any organization of any kind, any agency, or employee representation commitee, group, association, or plan, in which employees participate and which exists for the purpose, in whole or in part, of dealing with employers concerning grievances, labor disputes, wages, rates of pay, hours, or other terms or conditions of employment.

SEC. 2. Section 9 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsections:

"(i) No investigation shall be made by the Board of any question affecting commerce concerning the representation of employees, raised by a labor organization under subsection (c) of this section, and no complaint shall be issued pursuant to a charge made by a labor organization under subsection (b) of section 10, unless there is on file with the Board an affidavit executed contemporaneously or within the preceding twelve-month period by such labor organization and any national or international labor organization of which it is an affiliate or constituent unit declaring that the constitution or bylaws of such labor organization and of any national or international labor organization of which it is an affiliate or constituent unit provide that no authorized strike shall be called except upon approval of a majority of the employees in the affected unit voting by secret ballot in accordance with the following:

"(1) No strike ballot shall be taken until there have elapsed (A) a period of twenty days during which the labor organization shall have made all reasonable efforts to settle the dispute by means of collective bargaining, and (B) an additional period of twenty days to enable the parties to the dispute to explain fully their respective positions to the employees involved in the dispute and to the public;

"(2) Any such strike ballot shall be conducted by an election committee consisting of one member selected by the labor organization, one member selected by the employer, and a third member selected by such members. If the employer fails to select a member within five days after having been requested by the labor organization in writing to do so, such member shall be selected by the National Labor Relations Board. If the member selected by the employer or the Board and the member selected by the labor organization are unable to agree within five days upon the selection of the third member, such third member shall be selected by the National Labor Relations Board;

"(3) The election committee shall promptly prepare and distribute ballots by first-class mail to all employees in the bargaining unit involved in the labor dispute with appropriate instructions and envelopes to enable such employees to execute and return the ballots, addressed to a designated post office box accessible only to the elections committee as a body, in such manner that the signature of the voter will appear on the outer envelope for the purpose of determining his eligibility in case of dispute;

"(4) The election committee shall process and count the ballots in such manner that the identity of the individual casting a particular ballot will be unknown to the committee or to any other person, and after the votes have been tabulated shall certify the results of the election to the parties to the dispute; and

"(5) If a majority of the employees voting in such election vote to authorize a strike, such strike may be ordered or authorized by the labor organization, but only after the expiration of any collective bargaining contract then in effect. No strike shall be authorized to commence on a date later than eighty days following the date of the election pursuant to which such strike was authorized.

"(j) Upon the filing of a petition in writing signed by not less than 10 per centum of all of the employees of a bargaining unit or a petition signed by not less than two of the members of the election committee described in subsection (i) (2) of this section, alleging that a strike has been called in contravention of the provisions of subsection (i) of this section, the Board shall then proceed under the investigatory powers granted in this Act to consider the matter, and if the Board determines the allegations to be true, the Board will issue an order declaring that such strike was called without proper authority and instructing the bargaining unit involved to immediately comply with the provisions contained in subsection (i) of this section. Any labor organization which, within five days, fails to comply with any order issued by the Board in accordance with the provisions of this subsection shall, during the period of noncompliance, be ineligible for certification by the Board as the exclusive representative of any group of employees for collective bargaining purposes, and no investigation shall be made by the Board of any question affecting commerce concerning the representation of employees, raised by such labor organization under subsection (c) of this section during the period of noncompliance, nor shall any complaint be issued pursuant to a charge made by such labor organization under subsection (b) of section 10 during the period of noncompliance."

SEC. 3. (a) No labor organization which, during any taxable year which begins after the date of enactment of this Act, fails to comply with any order of the National Labor Relations Board issued under subsection (j) of section 9 of the National Labor Relations Act, within the time limits prescribed by such subsection (j), shall be entitled to exemption from Federal income tax under section 501(a) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 for such taxable year.

(b) The tax payable under the Federal income tax laws for any taxable year by a labor organization which has lost its Federal income tax exemption under paragraph (a) for such year shall be reduced by an amount which bears the same ratio to the amount otherwise payable as the number of days in such taxable year for which there was not any failure by such labor organization to comply with any order issued by the National Labor Relations Board under subsection (j) of section 9 of the National Labor Relations Act bears to the total number of days in such taxable year.

SEC. 4. (a) Every officer, agent, or other representative of a labor organization having any money or other property of such organization in his custody or possession by virtue of his position as such officer, agent, or representative shall have a duty to the members of the labor organization, requiring him to hold such money or property for the benefit of such members and for furthering the purposes for which the organization exists, and requiring him, in handling such money or property, to invest, apply, disburse, or otherwise dispose thereof only in accordance with such obligation and such purposes and in a manner authorized by the constitution, bylaws, and other governing rules of the organization.

(b) An action or proceeding may be maintained in any court of competent jurisdiction for an accounting or other appropriate relief with respect to any act or omission of any officer, agent, or other representative of a labor organization which is in disregard of the duty set forth in this section. Such action or proceeding may be maintained by one or more of the principal officers of such labor organization in behalf of the members thereof, or by any one or more of the members of the labor organization for and in behalf of himself or themselves and other members similarly situated, or by an agent or representative designated by any such member or members to maintain such action or proceeding for and on behalf of all members similarly situated.

(c) Nothing in this section shall reduce or limit the duties or responsibilities of any officer, agent, or other representative of a labor organization under any other law of the United States or the law of any State, and nothing in this section shall take away any right or bar any remedy to which members of a labor organization are entitled under any such law.

SEC. 5. (a) Every labor organization shall file with the Secretary, in such detail as may be required by the Secretary, a report with respect to its financial affairs containing the information required by this section, and shall file such a report not later than the 1st of March of each calendar year. The report shall be signed by the president or other chief executive officer of the labor organization and by its secretary or other chief records officer and its treasurer or other chief financial officer, and shall indicate the method by which the labor organization has made available to its members, pursuant to section 6, the information required to be contained in the report.

(b) Every such annual financial report shall show the assets and liabilities of the labor organization at the beginning and close of its last fiscal year, its financial activities during the year, the amounts and sources of its receipts and the amounts and purposes of its disbursements, including amounts paid as compensation and by way of expense or other allowances for each officer, agent, or employee whose aggregate compensation and allowances for the year exceeded $10,000.

(c) Every such annual financial report shall also explain in detail the full circumstances surrounding the receipt by the labor organization or (to the extent that information is available) by any of its officers, agents, or other representatives of any sum of money, any property, any loan, or any other thing of value which has been received during the year, directly or through an intermediary, from any employer (other than the United States or a wholly owned Government corporation or any State or political subdivision thereof) having employees who are or might be organized or represented by the labor organization, or from any person representing such an employer; except that this requirement shall not apply with respect to any transaction which is within the provisions of section 302(c) of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, as amended.

SEC. 6. Every labor organization required to file reports or other documents with the Secretary as provided in this Act shall, in such form and manner as the Secretary shall by regulations prescribe, make available to each of its members the information required to be contained in such reports or documents.

SEC. 7. Any person who makes a false statement or representation of a material fact, knowing it to be false, or who knowingly fails to disclose a material fact, in any document, report or other information required under the provisions of sections 5 or 6 or the rules or regulations issued thereunder shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, this bill would not cripple or curtail in any way the ability of labor unions to operate their collective bargaining processes.

In the second place, the bill contains nothing punitive or repressive whatsoever so far as legitimate activity of unions is concerned.

In the third place, the bill provides nothing that any honest, upright, labor leader seeking to serve the best interests of his union need either fear or oppose.

In brief outline, the bill does nine things; and in these nine provisions I believe it contains the authority, the tools of democracy, which will enable decent men and women, who represent the vast majority, I believe, of the members of every labor union in the country, to provide the rules of procedure by which they can control their own destiny and regulate the functions of their own unions, ridding themselves of unsavory union leadership where it exists, and of improper union practices where they prevail.

The first thing the bill would do would be to establish a well-defined mechanism for the democratic nomination of candidates through the employment of signed nominating petitions. We have found that a great many pieces of labor legislation and a great many of the labor constitutions falter and fail at the very point of nominating opponents for labor leaders who may be engaged in improper practices, who may be throwing their weight around with arrogant power, and who may actually be engaged in corrupt activities.

So, first and foremost, the bill provides the procedures for nominating a candidate under auspices and under circumstances by which there could be no intimidation of those seeking to place the name of a candidate in nomination.

Second, the bill provides for the establishment of a representative election committee from the rank and file of labor. No member of this committee shall be either an officer or employee of the local or the international involved, and, of course, no member of the election committee shall be a candidate for election.

In the third place, the bill provides that the election committee shall supervise the entire election procedure, including the counting of ballots—I emphasize that, "including the counting of ballots," and the certification of the results.

This is important, because we have found in our investigations over the past 2 years that frequently secret ballots are circumvented and destroyed and their effectiveness eliminated, because of dishonest election practices occurring after the secret ballots are cast.

Mr. President, without an honest accounting mechanism, the conduct of an election by secret ballot can be as big a fraud or hoax as one could be in which the members were not permitted to vote at all, or in which they were threatened because they were compelled to vote at an open, public meeting.

Fourth. It provides a workable procedure for investigating these elections by the Secretary of Labor following a complaint signed by either 2 percent of the union members or by any one member of the representative election committee.

Fifth. It provides for a workable judicial procedure to invalidate the results of irregularly held elections, and thereafter to decree the installation of officers elected in an election supervised by the Secretary of Labor.

Sixth. The bill provides for a democratic mechanism, properly supervised by a representative committee from both management and labor, for the authorization of strikes during collective bargaining negotiations.

This brings self-determination on the part of the rank and file dues paying members to the important decision of whether and when to call a strike.

Seventh. The bill provides that no individual who has been disenfranchised by any criminal conviction shall serve as any union officer or in any employee representative status.

It writes into this general labor legislation the substance of the amendment which I offered to the first Kennedy bill during the last Congress. My amendment was adopted by a yea-and-nay vote in the Senate. I believe it was a unanimous vote; if not, there were only one or two dissenting votes. It provides that individuals who have lost the right of franchise through crimes of which they have been convicted shall not be permitted to serve as union officers or as an employee representative.

Eighth. The bill provides for an annual detailed report of the financial activities of the labor organizations both to the Secretary of Labor and to the individual members of the labor organization. With respect to this reporting provision, the bill would impose criminal sanctions on any individual who willfully or knowingly would include in any of the required reports any false statements or purposeful misrepresentations.

Ninth. The bill provides for the imposition upon union officers and agents a fiduciary relationship with respect to their handling of union funds.

Mr. President, I recognize that both the bill proposed by the administration and the bill proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] contain provisions which deal with some of the same problems covered by my proposed legislation. I recognize that both bills contain provisions, for example, on the election of officers and delegates. However, I earnestly feel, from a careful study and analysis of both of those bills, that each of them fails to set out in great enough detail procedures which must be employed to guarantee that union members will have the opportunity to express without fear of coercion or intimidation their individual views in the selection of those who are to guide their economic destinies.

I believe, also, Mr. President, that the administration bill and the Kennedy bill alike are deficient in at least one other area of democratic procedures, and that is with respect to the authorization of strikes. The calling of a strike is something which should be given most serious consideration by each individual rank and file member of organized labor. It affects vitally his livelihood, sometimes it affects his very job, and certainly, it affects his annual income. I think, therefore, that Congress should set down certain important standards to insure that strikes will not be called without a majority of the members of the bargaining union involved having ample opportunity by secret ballot to express my appreciation to many people

In offering the bill I should like to express my appreciation to many people with whom I have consulted in preparing these measures. I should like to add one special word of appreciation to Mr. Maurice R. Franks, president of the National Labor Management Foundation of Chicago, who has helped greatly in developing certain of these ideas, especially those related to the strike ballot. That is a very significant part of the new legislative proposal. Those who are familiar with labor legislation will recognize the fact that Mr. Franks is not a newcomer to the field of labor. He was, as a matter of fact, for 28 years, connected with the Railroad Brotherhoods. His statements and writings in this field have come to the attention of a great many people. He served as the national business agent for the Switchmen and Yardmaster Brotherhoods for a long period of time.

Mr. President, let me say, in calling this proposed legislation to the attention of Congress and the country, that I have already conferred with the chairman of the subcommittee headed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY]. I have discussed the proposed legislation with him. He has agreed to accept a statement pointing out what I consider to be the values and virtues of this proposed legislation, as a part of the hearings on the legislation, since the oral hearings have been about concluded.

In summary, what my proposed bill does is to provide for the election of officers and for a nominating procedure by a formula which includes both the secret ballot and an honest count, so that those who belong to unions will be able to control their destiny, so far as it can be controlled, by the election of officers of their choosing and the election of responsible and respectable individuals as their union heads.

Secondly, it brings into play orderly procedures of democratic decision for conducting a strike vote, and it employs the mechanism of the secret ballot and an honest account.

In the third place, it eliminates racketeers and crooks from eligibility as officers of a union. Our hearings under the chairmanship of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN] sometimes became quite nauseating to those of us who had to sit where we watched a parade of racketeers and crooks and thugs and plug-uglies, who sat in front of us—who were known to be officials of labor unions, known not to have any concern whatever for the welfare of the workingmen, and known to be utilizing their offices to steal funds of the workers and betray their interest—cringing and hiding behind the fifth amendment.

This type of crooked union leadership would be eliminated by my bill, because at least those with past records of infamy so great that the States in which they live deny them the right to vote because of the seriousness of their crimes could not be fastened upon the shoulders of the fine, honest, decent, patriotic men and women who belong to the trade unions of America.

In the fourth place, the bill provides a fiduciary relationship between the union officers and the members of the union, so that the officers cannot with impunity betray union members, who have paid from their sweat and their toil assessments and dues sufficient to accumulate these vast funds under the heading of pension funds or welfare funds, or whatever they are, until they now represent hundreds of millions of dollars. These vast funds should be kept in reserve to protect the rights and interests of the rank-and-file union men and women, not, as our committee hearings have disclosed, used to promote and benefit corrupt self-seeking labor leaders for their selfish purposes.

Under my proposed legislation that practice would be abruptly stopped and completely prevented by placing these officers in a fiduciary relationship, punishable by court action and providing for reports to protect the interests of the rank-and-file, dues-paying members.

Finally, the proposed legislation provides adequate enforcement provisions to make certain that these reforms shall be effected.

The bill has been evolved by an honest effort to give decent labor unions and their members the power, the right, and the procedures to clean up their own unions whenever such a cleansing is required or is necessary.

I cannot conceive how any decent, honest, upright labor leader in America can conscientiously oppose a single factor in the bill. The bill simply provides that code of good behavior which the public and the working men and women have a right to expect from upright, honorable, respectable, and responsible labor leaders.

I certainly cannot conceive how any rank-and-file trade unionist in America could oppose a single paragraph or a single phrase in the proposed legislation, because every word and syllable is designed to protect him and his American rights and his dignity and interests as a human being.

I do not believe the laboring people of America are afraid of themselves or afraid of their power to govern their unions. I think they will welcome, as is indicated by the tens of thousands of communications we have received, legislation which will give them the tools with which to do the job which so many of them realize, better than you and I, Mr. President, needs very urgently to be done.

I do not think, as a matter of public relations, that any labor union even representing only the interests of the bosses can possibly describe the proposed legislation as being antilabor or antiunion. I submit there has never been a bill introduced which has been more prolabor and prounion, particularly thinking in terms of the dues-paying members, than this bill. It has been evolved from the evidence which I had the privilege to watch and to hear and to analyze during my past 2 years of service on the select committee headed by the distinguished senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN], the committee which has just this week been extended for another year of service, and the committee which, I believe, probably has more evidence available to it on this subject than any other committee of either House of Congress has ever had in this area of activity.

We have devoted long hours, many days, many weeks, and many months to the hearings, and we have had the assistance of a large, well-trained staff to explore this problem and to try to find an answer to it.

I cannot escape the conviction that by approaching the problem in this manner we will provide a challenge to the workers of America to do those things which they want to have done, so as to operate their unions in their own way, with honest, responsible leadership. I believe, Mr. President, that rank-and-file labor in America will respond magnificently to that challenge. They want their funds safeguarded and protected with the same rights which you and I and our constituents back home expect to enjoy, including the right to make decisions in polling places in secret ballot. They want to have their ballots counted honestly in the direction in which they are cast, not perverted, not destroyed, not miscounted, not taken up into a cabin on a mountainside, as some union ballots were taken to a California mountainside, as was explained in the evidence before our committee. The American working men and women want to have the same honorable and honest electoral procedures which we ourselves insist upon as we become candidates for the offices we hold.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

TRANSACTION OF ADDITIONAL ROUTINE BUSINESS

By unanimous consent, the following routine business was transacted:

FEDERAL AID TO EDUCATION—RESOLUTION

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I present, for appropriate reference, a resolution adopted by the Northeast Queens Council for Schools, of New York City, relating to assistance on a grant basis to help meet the problems of inadequate facilities and teachers' salaries. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY NORTHEAST QUEENS COUNCIL FOR SCHOOLS

Whereas there is still a serious shortage of classrooms and of teachers requiring emergency action on the part of the Federal Government; and

Whereas limited financial resources available to many communities are not adequate to support construction programs of sufficient size to eliminate their classroom shortages and not sufficient to provide proper compensation to their teachers; and

Whereas the national interest requires that the Federal Government assist State and local governments in solving these pressing problems: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Federal Government provide Federal financial assistance on a grant basis to help meet the problems of inadequate facilities and inadequate teachers' salaries by enacting such Federal aid to education legislation in 1959.

ESTABLISHMENT OF RURAL ELECTRIFICATION ADMINISTRATION AS AN INDEPENDENT AGENCY—RESOLUTIONS

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, the Nebraska Rural Electric Association met in State convention this week and adopted several resolutions. I ask unanimous consent to have one of those resolutions printed in the RECORD, and appropriately referred. The resolution endorses the bill which I have introduced to make the REA a separate agency. A similar bill has been introduced by Representative BROCK, of my State.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas Congressman LARRY BROCK and Senator CURTIS, both of Nebraska, have proposed legislation which would establish the Rural Electrification Administration as an independent agency outside of the Department of Agriculture; and

Whereas said proposed legislation would be for the best interest of the rural electrification program: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Nebraska Rural Electric Association, That the association go on record as favoring the proposed legislation sponsored by Congressman BROCK and Senator CURTIS so as to establish the Rural Electrification Administration as an independent agency.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I also ask to have printed in the RECORD, and appropriately referred, a resolution endorsing the same measure adopted by the Upson County Electric Membership Corp. board of directors of Upson County, Ga. Reference is made to the bill introduced by me and the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL].

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE UPSON COUNTY ELECTRIC MEMBERSHIP CORP. BOARD OF DIRECTORS

RESOLUTION

Whereas Senator CARL T. CURTIS, of Nebraska, has introduced in the U.S. Senate a bill to take the Rural Electrification Administration out of the U.S. Department of Agriculture altogether and make it an independent agency; and

Whereas Senator CURTIS was joined in introducing this measure by our own distinguished Senator RICHARD B. RUSSELL; and

Whereas the board of directors of the Upson County Electric Membership Corp., the majority of whom have been in the REA program since its inception and can testify that when the Rural Electrification Administration was an independent agency and was not compelled to answer to the political whims of the U.S. Department of Agriculture, it made great progress, and demonstrated that REA can operate independently in a highly successful manner as it was originally conceived to do by the Congress of the United States: Therefore be it

Resolved by the board of directors of the Upson County Electric Membership Corp., That we highly approve the action taken by the aforesaid Senators, and compliment them on their foresight for taking such action; and be it further

Resolved, That the members of the Georgia delegation in the Congress of the United States support the measure introduced by Senator CURTIS and our own Senator RICHARD B. RUSSELL.

Passed and approved this 21st day of January 1959.

(Signed) W. A. Gordy
W. A. GORDY,
President.

J. C. WOODSON,
Secretary-Treasurer.

(See the remarks of Mr. MUNDT when he introduced the above bill, which appear under a separate heading.)

PROHIBITION OF RESTRICTED COVENANTS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, this morning, February 6, the Washington Post carried an editorial entitled, "Restricted Covenants." Because of the pertinency of that editorial to the comments I am about to make, I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESTRICTED COVENANTS

Witnesses in the Civil Rights Commission's hearing on racial discrimination in housing have made a special point of how far Washington falls below the ideal of equality in this matter. Despite the decision of the Supreme Court some years ago that restricted covenants cannot be enforced in the courts, they remain on the books in a considerable number of communities in Washington and its suburbs. The result is that Negroes, Jews, and some other groups are denied equal rights in housing in the Nation's Capital.

Only the complete elimination of prejudice will wipe out this sort of discrimination. But there are additional steps that could be taken by the local government and Congress. Dr. Irving M. Engel, president of the American Jewish Committee, urged, for example, that Congress enact a law forbidding the recording of deeds that purport to restrict the sale of property to members of any racial group. Such a law would not end discrimination in housing, but it would be a salutary example of the right direction in which to travel.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, the testimony of Mr. Irving M. Engel before the Civil Rights Commission which occasioned the editorial carried a plea for congressional action to abolish this type of discrimination in housing.

Mr. President, I do not believe in any arrangement which seeks to perpetuate discriminatory treatment of a human being upon grounds of race, color, or religion.

I send to the desk for appropriate reference a bill to accomplish Mr. Engel's purpose in the District of Columbia. I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the text of the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any person who, in conveying or transferring the title to any real property in the District of Columbia, employs a deed, contract, or other instrument which contains a provision the effect of which, if enforcible, would be to prohibit the sale of such property to members of any racial group, or who, in conveying or transferring the title to any real property in the District of Columbia, enters into any agreement, contract, or other arrangement relating to any such conveyance or transfer the effect of which, if enforcible, would be to prohibit the sale of such property to members of any racial group, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than 1 year, or both.

SEC. 2. As used in this Act, the term "person" means any individual, partnership, association, corporation, legal representative, trustee, trustee in bankruptcy, receiver or any organized group of persons.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, in explanation of the language of the bill, I wish to make it crystal clear that by the language used I intend, and I hope that the intent of the Congress as it passes this bill will be, to outlaw any form of restrictive covenant based upon race, color, or religion, whether it be by the vendor or his agent, or whether or not the vendor or his agent be resident within the District. The language applies to the instrument whether it is a deed or a contract, or whether it is in the form of a supplementary side agreement.

Senators will note that in the language of the bill I have not tried to eliminate the evil of the restrictive covenant by forbidding its being recorded. There is a very practical reason for this. Such language might have had the undesirable consequence of penalizing an innocent buyer who could, under that procedure, find himself in the position of being unable to obtain title to his bought property. An unscrupulous vendor, by the inclusion of a restrictive covenant, would then remain the owner of record and would be in the position of perhaps selling the same piece of property many times over fraudulently. No, Mr. President; this evil should be scotched at the source. By imposing sanctions against the seller or his agent, I have provided in this proposed legislation a built-in safeguard which will make it to the interest of every real-estate broker or lawyer engaged in the conveyance of real estate to eliminate these restrictive relics of past injustice from the deeds they convey.

I ask that the bill be appropriately referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1000) to prohibit the inclusion in any deed transferring real property within the District of Columbia of any provision restricting the sale of such property to members of any racial group, introduced by Mr. MORSE, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

INDIANA DUNES NATIONAL MONUMENT

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and Senators MURRAY, MORSE, NEUBERGER, CHURCH, PROXMIRE, GRUENING, and HUMPHREY, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to authorize the establishment of the Indiana Dunes National Monument.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1001) to authorize the establishment of the Indiana Dunes National Monument, introduced by Mr. DOUGLAS (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I first introduced this bill in the 85th Congress as Senate bill 3898. I now introduce a similar bill with some perfecting amendments.

Mr. President, the purpose for which I introduce this bill is to preserve for all of the citizens of our country a priceless piece of geologic and botanical history which is unique on the Western continents, or, indeed, in the world.

This bill provides that the Secretary of Interior is authorized and directed to acquire by gift, purchase, or condemnation, the unspoiled areas of not more than 5,000 acres situated in the State of Indiana on the shore of Lake Michigan, generally known as the Indiana Dunes, but including the unspoiled forests, dunes, beaches, bogs, and landscapes in which plant and animal life from many kinds of terrain are collected in a small space by a geological accident of history. It is a space attractive to the layman for the unspoiled nature which still is to be found in the shifting sands, and to the scientist for the variety of nature's gifts which are uniquely gathered together at this spot. The bill provides that not less than 50 percent of the cost of such lands as are acquired by the Secretary of Interior shall be procured by donation or with donated funds. The established communities of Ogden Dunes and Dune Acres are specifically excluded from the provisions of the bill.

Senators may well ask why a Senator from Illinois should take the lead in preserving this area which lies in the State of Indiana. Mr. President, the importance of these dunes transcends the claims of a single State. But, Mr. President, many citizens of the State of Indiana have written to me asking that I assist them to preserve this area for the citizens of Indiana and other States. And, Mr. President, I invited the honorable Senators from the State of Indiana to join me in support of this legislation, and I shall be glad to have them join me when the many benefits of this bill shall have, on their own merits, won them to the same point of view.

In the meanwhile, I feel that the issues at stake are of significance to all of our States.

This is no new proposal. Forty years ago, when our national park system was created by the initiative of a great public citizen, Stephen T. Mather, this was one of the particular areas to which he directed special attention, along with the great Yellowstone area, which is one of our great national parks.

Why has this area been of interest to all of us who seek to preserve an essential system of national parks and monuments?

Mr. President, this area originally occupied 25 miles of uninterrupted Lake Michigan shoreline. Even 40 years ago, it was a mecca for citizens of more populous areas of northern Indiana and of Chicago, who sought the refuge of natural surroundings. The efforts of Stephen Mather, Horace Albright, and the writer and artist, Earl Reed, to authorize the establishment of the area as a national park were interrupted by the First World War. Progressive waves of industrialization have encroached upon this original stretch, until today there are only 4 left of the original 25-mile strip. This 4-mile strip is in serious jeopardy today, Mr. President. We seek to preserve this small part which remains.

Let me describe the features of this remarkable area.

First, we have an outstanding example of Lake Michigan sand dunes: a living, moving landscape of great beauty and considerable scientific interest.

The glaciers which came before history began also later receded, carrying with them seeds of plants originally growing much farther south and much farther north. They deposited these seeds at this spot and now there exist in this small space many southern plants which cannot ordinarily be found this far north, as well as northern plants which cannot ordinarily be found this far south. So we have here a mixed garden which cannot be duplicated anywhere in the world. I call upon my southern colleagues to unite with me in supporting the preservation of this fine example of cooperation and creativity transcending regional differences.

We have here one of the few remaining way stations for migratory birds in the Midwest. More than 100 species of birds nest here.

The dunes also are significant in the history of our continent. The Indians crossed this area before the white man came, and I have found with my own feet traces of the footprints they left and the paths they trod hundreds of years ago. After the arrival of European settlers, trappers and traders, missionaries and warriors, crossed by this route. In 1675, Marquette passed through, shortly before he died near Ludington. La Salle came in 1677 on his way to Montreal. Pontiac captured Little Fort, a site near Tremont, in 1754. The Spanish occupied the area in 1781; and in 1803 soldiers passed through on the way to build Fort Dearborn.

Scientists, too, have long been interested in the area. To quote from Stephen T. Mather:

> The sand dunes are admittedly wonderful, and they are inherently distinctive because they best illustrate the action of the wind on the sand accumulated from a great body of water. No national park or other Federal reservation offers this phenomenon.

The geologist, Prof. T. C. Chamberlain, describes the creation of the dunes as follows:

> This earth of ours is a living, active organism constantly reshaping itself * * * selecting and assorting its material.
> The dunes are themselves a beautiful expression of the selective and accumulative action of nature. * * * The material that is washed from the banks of the lake is exceedingly mixed material. But the waves at once begin a selective process. * * * The dirty material * * * is washed out and deposited in the deeper and quieter waters. The coarser material is left * * * along the shore and then the waves wash that up and down * * * and at length * * * part is thrown up by the action of the waves and left to dry on the beach.
> The strata of earth are derived from mixed material in this way and have been so derived for millions of years. * * * But the dunes illustrate a cooperative action on the part of the wind. This * * * material is caught by the wind and drifted forward until it finds lodgment, and this lodgment illustrates the power of the wind, the turmoil to which the basal part of the atmosphere is subjected; and out of that come these beauties.

The eminent botanist, Prof. Henry C. Cowles, reports that when he had the pleasure of conducting a number of great European scientists through our country, on a schedule which permitted them to visit only three or four of our great natural wonders, they chose the Grand Canyon, Yosemite, Yellowstone Park, and the Indiana Dunes, out of all of the wonders which they might have seen. He reports:

> There are few places on our continent where so many species of plants are found in so small a compass. * * * Within a stone's throw of almost any spot one may find plants of the desert and plants of rich woodlands, plants of the pine woods, and plants of swamps, plants of oak woods, and such plants of the prairies. Species of the most diverse natural regions are piled here together in such abundance as to make the region a natural botanical preserve. * * * Here one may find the prickly pear cactus of the southwestern desert hobnobbing with the berrberry of the arctic and alpine regions. * * *
> Nowhere perhaps in the entire world of plants does the struggle for life take on such dramatic and spectacular phases as in the dunes. A dune in the early days of its career is a moving landscape, a place that is never twice alike; it is a body of sand which, under the influence of wind, moves indifferently over swamp or town or forest. Perhaps nothing in all nature except a volcano with its lava flow is to be compared with such a moving dune.

Since 1916, the factories and mills have crowded over the Lake Michigan shore from the other side of Chicago back eastward into Indiana. All that is left is Indiana State Park with a 3-mile shoreline, and about 4 miles of unused shoreline. It is this remaining 4 miles which we seek to protect.

Without action, these last 4 miles will be overrun also, as have been the other 20 and more miles formerly covered with these beautiful dunes. Plans are already being made, and bulldozers are already starting to turn the area into slag piles, mills, wharves, with their accompanying pavements, noise, and smoke and air pollution. Ownership of much of the area is presently in the hands of Bethlehem Steel and National Steel. The Corps of Engineers has blueprints of a harbor which would cut right through the middle of the dunes. Mills would be constructed on the site and would damage the neighboring State park with the noise and air and water pollution. In the present dune's area which lies outside the State park, historic trails would be eliminated; botanical and biological exhibits would be uprooted; migratory bird stations would no longer exist; wildlife would be homeless; bogs would be drained, and the living and moving landscape would be eliminated forever and the area would be turned into an asphalt jungle.

Mr. President, we all know that industrialization and jobs are important from many points of view: We need more production and more employment in Indiana as well as in other parts of our Nation. Indiana has gone to considerable efforts to attract industry, and her efforts deserve to be rewarded. The Bethlehem and the National Steel Corp. have shown wisdom in choosing the Calumet area for their projected expansion, for this area has much to offer heavy industry in natural advantages and in available skilled labor supply. But there are other areas in Indiana besides these sand dunes nearby which would prove equally suitable in the long run and which would cost nothing in terms of conservation of our national heritage. Let me make it clear that we in Illinois do not want to take this steel mill for ourselves. We want it to be in Indiana. But there are other places along the Indiana lakefront where it can be located.

I cannot believe that when the boards of directors of these great companies have fully weighed the facts and conquences of placing their plants in this natural park that they will insist upon going ahead with this plan.

I hope that they will feel as we feel who want to preserve the remaining areas of natural wilderness, and spare this strip of shoreline so that we may save it for the people of the Nation.

The matter has already attracted widespread national interest.

The Advisory Board on National Parks, Historic Sites, Buildings, and Monuments of the Department of the Interior has recommended steps for the protection of the area to the Secretary of the Interior. We have the wholehearted support of many fine conservation groups, including the National Parks Association, the Garden Clubs of America, Indiana State branch; the Save the Dunes Council; the Indiana Federation of Women's Clubs; the National Wildlife Federation; the Wildlife Management Institute; the Wilderness Society; the Council of Conservationists, Inc.; the American Nature Association; the American Planning and Civic Association; the Conservation Council; Nature Conservancy; and others.

Mr. President, I ask that the Members of this body may give earnest study to this proposal and I hope that they will join in support of this bill to create the Indiana Dunes National Monument. I ask this in the name of the people of Indiana, to whom it should belong forever; in the name of the people of Illinois, who have enjoyed its beauties for many years; and in the name of all the people of the United States, who have a natural claim on the remainder of their natural resources, and who need park space and play space, as well as working and living space, if they are to live the full and happy lives which are the natural right of every American.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Special Recognition of the Outstanding Abilities of Hon. J. T. Rutherford, of Texas

OF
HON. RALPH YARBOROUGH
OF TEXAS
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, February 6, 1959

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, the term "public servant" is sometimes overworked, but I rise today to pay special recognition to a man who has—by his wisdom and hard work—earned the right to this title in its finest sense.

I call attention to the outstanding abilities of the Honorable J. T. RUTHERFORD, Representative of the 16th Congressional District of Texas, who has humbly, conscientiously, and unselfishly worked for the best interests of his district, his State, and his Nation during his entire career.

A moment ago, I mentioned his outstanding abilities. Mr. RUTHERFORD'S talents are particularly evident in the field of public finance. His efforts in the public interest as a member of the House Banking and Currency Committee have occasioned extremely high praise from his colleagues. He is an unusually able member of the House Interior and Insular Affairs Committee.

Mr. RUTHERFORD was capably serving his State prior to his election to the 84th Congress on November 2, 1954. From 1948 to 1952 he was in the Texas House of Representatives and then served a term in the Texas Senate from 1952 to 1954 when the voters around his home gave further praise to his work by electing him to the national Congress. The people recognized a man who would work for them and stand by his principles at all times. I knew Congressman RUTHERFORD during his years in the Texas Legislature, and have been gladdened by his progress.

Mr. President, in recognition of Mr. RUTHERFORD'S fine work in the national interest, I request unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a portion of his weekly "Report to the People" which I believe shows his interest in bettering the public financial picture.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REPORT TO THE PEOPLE
(By Congressman J. T. RUTHERFORD)

Birthday greetings are usually reserved for individuals, but this week I would like to say "happy birthday" to a Government agency: The Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation.

There are many people who may not be aware of the existence of FDIC, nor familiar with its functions. I confess that my attention to the agency is brought about by my service on the House Banking and Currency Committee, which has jurisdiction over it. Yet, if you have a bank account, chances are your money is insured by FDIC.

The greatest tribute that may be paid to the organization is that this month it reached its 25th birthday without fanfare. It may be that FDIC has moved so firmly into history as one of the greatest financial reforms of the 20th century that no one feels the need to recall its basic beginnings. But 25 years ago, respected businessmen's and bankers' opposition to what they felt was Government banking was a bitter thing. Many well-meaning financiers and private citizens claimed the creation of FDIC would encourage recklessness among bankers, would discredit honesty and invite incredible abuses. Many of those former critics, still on the scene today, would probably like to forget their dire predictions but there are yellowed newspaper clippings around to remind them.

The purpose of the FDIC is simple: To insure us against bank disasters and to guarantee against the collapse of America's banking system as occurred inthe early thirties.

The system has worked well. Although perhaps a half-dozen banks will fail over the Nation this year (the current annual average), countless innocent families will not suffer and there will be no wild-eyed panic, because the accounts will almost surely be insured by Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation.

As of today, FDIC is insuring deposits of 13,383 of the Nation's 14,095 commercial and mutual savings banks. The insured banks hold 96 percent of all bank deposits in the Nation. (Of the 712 banks which aren't insured, about one-fifth fail to meet requirements, and the rest haven't joined because they resent the cost of the insurance or say they don't need it.)

The insurance maximum is $10,000 for each depositor, which means that if you have several accounts in different banks each will be insured up to that amount. Since approximately 98 percent of all accounts involve balances of less than $10,000 it is easy to see the vast majority of accounts are fully and completely insured.

In its 25 years, FDIC has built a nest egg of more than $1.8 billion. It raises funds by assessing member banks at the rate of one-twelfth of 1 percent of the insured bank's deposits, but has done so well it has been returning about 60 percent of the assessments. During its lifetime, the agency has paid out more than $343 million in insurance to about 1,500,000 depositors in 432 banks.

The spectacular success of FDIC has surpassed even the most enthusiastic predictions of its early supporters. And at the risk of using a poor pun, one might say its profits have made bad prophets of its detractors and former foes.

SENATE

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1959

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou in whose will is our peace, our spirits are made solemn by the vastness of the vistas revealed through the clear windows of prayer.

Grant us such a vision of the amazing sweep of Thy purposes for all Thy children that we may be delivered from the stings of irritating trifles and be less agitated by the little annoyances which daily pressures bring.

Amid all life's changing scenes, may our ordered lives know the blessed fulfillment of Thy promise—"I will keep that man in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on Me."

In a day when all the most precious values are imperiled by powers of darkness, arouse and stir us from our selfish love of comfort. Drive us, we beseech Thee, by the compulsion of these volcanic times, from our too easy nests. Give us open eyes to see the momentous facts of our generation, and undergird us with courage to meet them, and dedicated intelligence to handle them.

We ask it in the Redeemer's name. Amen.

PRODUCTION OF DOCUMENTARY MATERIAL, ACQUISITION OF ASSETS OF OTHER BANKS BY BANKS, AND PRIOR NOTIFICATION OF CORPORATE MERGERS

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, three-point legislative program which was gotten out by the Attorney General.

The first of these proposals is a suggested "Antitrust Civil Process Act of 1959," which will give to the Department of Justice much needed authority to compel the production of documents during the investigative or precomplaint stage of civil antitrust proceedings.

As the Attorney General said in his letter of August 12, when he forwarded this proposal for possible staff study following the adjournment of the 85th Congress:

Effective antitrust enforcement requires full and comprehensive investigation before formal proceedings, either civil or criminal, are commenced. Yet, under existing law the Department has no authority to compel the production of documents during the investigative or precomplaint stage of civil antitrust proceedings. When criminal proceedings are contemplated, of course, the grand-jury process adequately enables the Department to effect the production of both documentary and oral evidence from noncooperative organizations. However, when only civil proceedings are indicated, the Department is completely dependent on voluntary cooperation in the investigative stage—and that is not always forthcoming. The grand-jury procedure is considered to be improper in such cases and, of course, is never available with respect to mergers under section 7 of the Clayton Act since no crime its involved in such instances. Charges of monopolization or illegal merger are most often brought on the civil side. In such cases, then, the Department must presently rely on the cooperation of prospective defendants either to give it the detailed information, or to permit access to their files to search for information indispensable to an accurate analysis of the situation in question. The proposed bill would end our dependence on such voluntary cooperation.

A second major proposal warranting early congressional consideration is one requiring that the Department of Justice and the Federal Trade Commission (or the appropriate commission or board vested with jurisdiction) be advised in advance of merger plans involving corporations having a combined capital structure in excess of $10 million. This dollar limitation eliminates any potential burden upon small business, while the measure provides a useful tool to enable the Government to learn of and evaluate proposed mergers which may have a significant effect upon the national economy. This bill will ease a most difficult investigative burden, and at the same time afford a more evenhanded enforcement of section 7 of the Clayton Act, relating to mergers. I should like to emphasize that the measure does not contemplate the barring of mergers by virtue of executive branch disapproval of merger plans. It does, however, permit the Government to evaluate the effect of a proposed merger on competition, and to indicate, for consideration by the companies involved, whether the Government will interpose objection in the courts. This should be of mutual benefit to business organizations and to the Government.

The third enclosed legislative proposal would amend section 7 of the Clayton Act, which section now generally prohibits corporations from acquiring either the stock or the assets of other corporations when such acquisition would substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly. Insofar as banks are concerned, the section now reaches only mergers by virtue of stock acquisitions. Because increasingly large numbers of bank mergers are effectuated through asset acquisitions which may have serious anticompetitive effects, it seems most desirable that such mergers be brought within the scope of section 7.

Your particular attention is directed to page 53 of the Economic Report of the President, transmitted to the Congress on January 20, 1959 (H. Doc. 28, 86th Cong.), in which the three legislative proposals above described were recommended among improvements in our antitrust laws which would enhance the vigorous competition on which the "vitality of our economic system depends in large part."

The Bureau of the Budget has advised that there is no objection to the submission of these recommendations.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bills be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bills will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bills will be printed in the RECORD.

The bills, introduced by Mr. WILEY, were received, read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

S. 1003. A bill to authorize the Attorney General to compel the production of documentary material required in civil investigations for the enforcement of the antitrust laws, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Antitrust Civil Process Act of 1959."

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 2. As used in this Act—

(a) The term "antitrust laws", as used herein, is defined in section 1 of "An Act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes", approved October 15, 1914 (38 Stat. 730 (15, U.S.C. 12), as amended, commonly known as the Clayton Act.

(b) The term "antitrust investigator" means any attorney employed by the Department of Justice who is charged with the duty of enforcing any of the antitrust laws.

(c) The term "organization", means any corporation, partnership, firm, association, trust, foundation, company or other legal entity not a natural person.

(d) The term "documentary material" includes the original or any copy of any book, records, report, memorandum, paper communication, tabulation, chart, or other document in the possession, custody, or control of any organization.

CIVIL INVESTIGATIVE DEMAND

SEC. 3. (a) Whenever the Attorney General has reason to believe that any organization may be in possession, custody, or control of any documentary material relevant to the subject matter of an investigation of a possible antitrust violation he may, prior to the institution of a civil or criminal proceeding thereon, execute and issue in writing, and cause to be served upon such organization, a civil investigative demand requiring such organization to produce such documentary material and permit inspection and copying.

(b) Each such demand shall—

(1) state the statute and section or sections thereof alleged violation of which is under investigation, and the general subject matter of the investigation;

(2) describe the class or classes of documentary material to be produced thereunder with reasonable specificity so as fairly to identify the material demanded;

(3) prescribe a return date which will provide a reasonable period of time within which the documentary material is to be produced;

(4) identify the antitrust investigator to whom such documentary material is to be made available for inspection and copying.

(c) No such demand shall—

(1) contain any requirement which would be unreasonable or improper if contained in a subpena duces tecum issued by a court of the United States in aid of a grand jury investigation of such alleged violation; or

(2) require the production of any documentary material which would be privileged from disclosure, or which for any other reason would not be required to be disclosed if demand by a subpena duces tecum issued by a court of the United States in aid of a grand jury investigation of such alleged violation.

(d) Any such demand may be served by any antitrust investigator or U.S. marshal or deputy marshal at any place within the territorial jurisdiction of any court of the United States.

(e) Service of any such demand may be made by—

(1) delivering a duly executed copy thereof to any executive officer of the organization to be served; or

(2) delivering a duly executed copy thereof to the principal office or place of business of the organization to be served; or

(3) mailing by registered or certified mail a copy thereof addressed to such organization to be served at its principal office or place of business.

(f) A verified return by the individual serving such demand, setting forth the manner of such service, shall be proof of such service. In the case of service by registered or certified mail, such return shall be accompanied by the return post office receipt of delivery of such demand.

(g) An organization upon whom a demand is served pursuant to the provisions of this section shall comply with the terms thereof unless otherwise provided by an order of court issued under section 5 hereof.

(h) Documentary material demanded pursuant to the provisions of this section shall be produced for inspection and copying during normal business hours at the principal office or place of business of the organization served, or at such other times and places as may be agreed upon by the organization served and any authorized employee of the Department of Justice.

SEC. 4. (a) No documentary material produced pursuant to a demand, or copies thereof, shall, unless otherwise ordered by a district court for good cause shown, be produced for inspection or copying by, nor shall the contents thereof be disclosed to, other than an authorized employee of the Department of Justice, without the consent of the organization who produced such material: Provided, That, under such reasonable terms and conditions as the Attorney General shall prescribe, the copies of such documentary material shall be available for inspection and copying by the organization who produced such material or any duly authorized representative of such organization. The Attorney General or any authorized employee of the Department of Justice may use such copies of documentary material as he determines necessary in the performance of his official duties, including presentation of any case or proceeding before any court or grand jury.

(b) When documentary material produced pursuant to a demand is no longer required for use in connection with the investigation for which it was demanded, or in any case or proceeding resulting therefrom, or at the end of eighteen months following the date when such material was produced, whichever is the sooner, such organization shall be relieved of the duty to hold such documentary material available for inspection and copying as required by section 3(a): Provided, however, That any district court in which a petition may be filed as set forth in section 5 hereof may, upon good cause shown, extend said period of eighteen months.

JURISDICTION OF DISTRICT COURT

SEC. 5. (a) The United States district courts are vested with jurisdiction to hear and determine any petition filed under this Act and to issue upon good cause shown any order which justice may require, including, without limiting the generality of the foregoing, the following:

(1) an order modifying or setting aside any such demand;

(2) an order requiring the Attorney General or any organization or individual to perform any duty imposed upon him by the provisions of this Act;

(3) an order extending the time within which any act allowed or required by this Act must be done, pursuant to a demand issued hereunder, or previous court orders.

(b) At any time before the return date specified in the demand, or within twenty days after the demand has been served, whichever period is shorter, a petition to modify or set aside a demand issued pursuant to section 3 may be filed in the U.S. district court for the district in which the principal office or place of business of the organization upon whom such demand was served is located, or in such other district as the parties may agree.

(c) A petition to require the Attorney General or any organization or individual to perform any duty imposed by the provisions of this Act, and all other petitions in connection with a demand, may be filed in the U.S. district court for the district in which the principal office or place of business of the organization involved is located, or in such other district as the parties may agree.

(d) To the extent that such rules may have application and are not inconsistent with the provisions of this Act, the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure shall apply to any petition under this Act.

PENALTY

SEC. 6. Any organization or individual who, with intent to avoid, evade, prevent, or obstruct compliance in whole or in part, by any organization with any civil investigative demand made under this Act, willfully removes from any place, conceals, withholds, destroys, mutilates, alters or by any other means falsifies any documentary material in the possession, custody or control of any organization or individual which is the subject of any demand duly served upon any organization shall be deemed guilty of an offense against the United States, and shall be subject, upon conviction in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, to a fine of $5,000 or to imprisonment for a term of not more than 5 years, or both.

SAVING PROVISION

SEC. 7. S. 1004. A bill to amend the Clayton Act by prohibiting the acquisition of assets of other banks by banks, banking associations, or trust companies when the effect may be substantially to lessen competition, or to tend to create a monopoly.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That paragraphs 1 and 2 of section 7 of the Act entitled "An Act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes", approved October 15, 1914, as amended (64 Stat. 1125; 15 U.S.C. 18), are amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 7. No corporation shall acquire directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital and no corporation subject to the jurisdiction of the Federal Trade Commission and no bank, banking association, or trust company shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the assets of one or more corporations engaged in commerce, where in any line of commerce in any section of the country, the effect of such acquisition of such stock or assets, or of the use of such stock by the voting or granting of proxies or otherwise, may be substantially to lessen competition, or to tend to create a monopoly."

S. 1005. A bill to amend the Clayton Act, as amended, by requiring prior notification of corporate mergers and acquisitions, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 7 of the Act "An Act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914, as amended (64 Stat. 1125; 15 U.S.C. 18), is amended by deleting the first three paragraphs and inserting in lieu thereof the following new paragraphs:

"No corporation shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital and no corporation subject to the jurisdiction of the Federal Trade Commission shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the assets of one or more corporations engaged in commerce, where in any line of commerce in any section of the country the effect of such acquisition of such stock or assets, or of the use of such stock by the voting or granting of proxies or otherwise, may be substantially to lessen competition or to tend to create a monopoly.

"No corporation subject to the provisions of this Act shall acquire, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock, other share capital or assets of one or more corporations engaged in commerce, where the combined capital, surplus, and undivided profits of the acquiring and the acquired corporations are in excess of a book value of $10,000,000 until sixty days after delivery to the Commission or Board vested with jurisdiction under the first paragraph of section 11 of this Act and to the Attorney General of notice of the proposed acquisition. This notice shall include, separately as to the acquiring and acquired corporations: (1) the name and address; (2) the nature of business and products or services sold or distributed; (3) net sales for the last accounting year; (4) copy of last annual report and balance sheet; and (5) location of plants and trading area in which each product or service is sold. The parties shall furnish within twenty-five days after request therefor, such additional relevant information within their knowledge or control as may be requested within twenty-five days after delivery of notice of the proposed acquisition by the Commission or Board vested with jurisdiction under section 11 of this Act or by the Attorney General: Provided, That upon request of the parties the Commission or Board or Attorney General may extend the time for furnishing such additional relevant information. If any party to an acquisition which has been consummated, has willfully failed to give the required notice or to furnish the required information, such party shall be subject to a penalty of not less than $5,000 or more than $50,000, which may be recovered in a civil action brought by the Attorney General. No other person shall be entitled to sue either party to the acquisition for failure under this paragraph to give notice or to furnish the required information and such penalty shall be the sole remedy for willful failure to give notice or to furnish the required information. Any officer or employee of the Commission or Board vested with jurisdiction under section 11 of this Act or of the Department of Justice, who shall make public any information furnished to the Commission or Board or Attorney General pursuant to the provisions of this paragraph, without the authority of the Commission or Board or Attorney General, unless directed by a court, or unless such information has already been made public, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both. Failure by the Federal Trade Commission, the Attorney General or other appropriate agency to request additional relevant information pursuant to this paragraph or to interpose objection to such acquisition within the sixty-day period shall not bar the institution at any time of any action or proceeding with respect to such acquisition under any provision of law. The Commission or Board vested with jurisdiction under section 11 of this Act, after consultation with and upon approval of the Attorney General, shall establish procedures for the waiver by the appropriate Commission or Board and the Attorney General and such Commission or Board and the Attorney General shall waive all or part of the waiting requirements in appropriate cases and in categories of cases where a waiting period is deemed unnecessary to effectuate enforcement of this section of this Act: Provided, however, That such procedures may be amended from time to time as the Commission or Board, upon the approval of the Attorney General, considers appropriate.

"The notification and waiting period provisions of the preceding paragraph shall not apply to the following:

"(1) Any acquisition of stock when the stock acquired or held does not exceed 10 per centum of the voting rights, as represented by the voting stock or other voting share capital, of the corporation in which the stock is acquired:

"(2) Any acquisition of stock in a single transaction or series of related transactions, unless the fair market value of the consideration paid for such stock in such transaction or transactions exceed $2,000,000;

"(3) Any acquisition of stock which does not increase, directly or indirectly, the acquiring corporation's share of voting rights in any other corporation;

"(4) Any acquisition, in a single transaction or series of related transactions, by one corporation of assets of any other corporation if the fair market value of the consideration paid for such assets in such transaction or transactions (after deducting the portion thereof comprising stock in trade used in the ordinary course of the transferring corporation's business, and transferred by such acquisition) does not exceed $2,000,000;

"(5) Acquisition by any corporation of bonds or other obligations without voting rights of any other corporation, securities issued by the United States, or by any State, Territory, or insular possession thereof, or by any political subdivision or public agency or instrumentality of one or more of any of the foregoing;

"(8) Any acquisition by any corporation from the Government of the United States, or from the government of any State, Territory, or insular possession thereof, or from any political subdivision or public agency or instrumentality of one or more of any of the foregoing;

"(9) Acquisition, solely for the purpose of investment, of assets, other than voting stock or other voting share capital, by any bank, banking association, trust company, or insurance company, in the ordinary course of its business; acquisition by any bank, banking association, or trust company of the assets of another bank, banking association, or trust company;

"(10) Acquisition of stock, other share capital, or assets of any corporation, if the acquiring corporation, prior to such acquisition, owned, directly or indirectly, more than 50 per centum of the outstanding voting stock of the corporation whose stock, other share capital, or assets are acquired, or if more than 50 per centum of the outstanding voting stock of the acquiring corporation is owned, directly or indirectly, by a corporation which, prior to such acquisition, owned, directly or indirectly, more than 50 per centum of the outstanding voting stock of the corporation whose stock, other share capital, or assets are acquired, or if more than 50 per centum of the outstanding voting stock of the acquiring corporation is owned, directly or indirectly, by the corporation from which the stock, other share capital, or assets are acquired;

"(11) Any acquisition of stock, other share capital, or assets, solely for the purpose of investment, by any corporation engaged wholly in religious, educational, or charitable activities;

"(15) Any acquisition of stock or assets which, under any specific provision of law, requires the approval in advance of a commission or board or other agency of the United States, and when so approved is exempt under any specific provision of law from the provisions of this section: Provided, however, That any commission, board, or agency of the United States which is authorized by law to approve the acquisition by one corporation of the stock or assets of another corporation where by virtue of such approval such acquisition is exempted from the provisions of this section shall promptly notify the Attorney General of any application or request for such approval.

"Except for the provisions of the second paragraph of this section, the section shall not apply to corporations purchasing stock solely for investment and not using the same by voting or otherwise to bring about, or in attempting to bring about, the substantial lessening of competition. Nor shall anything contained in this section prevent a corporation engaged in commerce from causing the formation of subsidiary corporations for the actual carrying on of their immediate lawful business, or the natural and legitimate branches or extensions thereof, or from owning and holding all or a part of the stock of such subsidiary corporations, when the effect of such formation is not substantially to lessen competition."

SEC. 2. The second paragraph of said section 7 as herein amended shall take effect one hundred and twenty days after enactment of this Act. The procedures for the waiver by the appropriate commission or board and the Attorney General of all or part of the waiting requirements in appropriate cases and categories of cases required by the second paragraph of said section 7, as herein amended, shall be established within one hundred and twenty days after enactment of this Act.

SEC. 3. Nothing contained in the first paragraph of said section 7 as herein amended shall be held to affect or impair any right heretofore legally acquired: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be held or construed to authorize or make lawful anything heretofore prohibited or made illegal by the antitrust laws, nor to exempt any person from the penal provisions thereof or the civil remedies therein provided.

The letter and explanation presented by Mr. FULBRIGHT are as follows:

U.S. INFORMATION AGENCY,
Washington, January 30, 1959.

The VICE PRESIDENT,
U.S. Senate.

DEAR MR. VICE PRESIDENT: I have the honor to transmit to the Congress a draft bill "to promote the foreign policy of the United States by strengthening and improving the Foreign Service personnel system of the U.S. Information Agency through establishment of a Public Affairs Officer Corps," which provides authority for the Agency to establish a career service for its Foreign Service personnel. Also enclosed is a detailed explanation of the bill, together with estimates of increased cost.

The Agency has unfortunately not had sufficient authority for this purpose since its creation in 1953, although proposals to establish a career service for Foreign Service personnel were submitted to both the 84th Congress and the 85th Congress. The most recent of these proposals, together with certain other amendments to the U.S. Information and Educational Exchange Act of 1948 proposed by the Agency and by the Department of State, was submitted to Congress in 1957 and subsequently was introduced in the Senate as S. 1583 (see pp. 7–10 of the bill). On the House side, the same career service proposal was substantially revised by the Subcommittee on State Department Organization and Foreign Operations of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, and as thus revised was introduced, together with other Agency-proposed provisions, as H.R. 8081 (see pp. 2–6 of the bill). No further action was taken on either S. 1583 or H.R. 8081 during the 85th Congress.

The enclosed career service proposal is substantially the same as that submitted to the Congress in 1957, but includes certain changes embodied in H.R. 8081 which provide for equal representation by officers of the State Department and of the Agency on certain boards and panels. We believe that these changes represent improvements, and that they will tend to promote uniformity in the procedures of the Agency and of the Department of State with respect to the Foreign Service personnel of each.

This bill is not submitted as an amendment to the U.S. Information and Educational Exchange Act of 1948, as was the case in the past, but is proposed as entirely separate and independent legislation. There appears to be no logical reason for attaching a proposal authorizing a career Foreign Service personnel system to an act which is concerned with authority for the conduct of program activities in the fields of overseas information and international education exchange.

The Bureau of the Budget has advised that there is no objection to the presentation of this bill and explanation to the Congress.

Sincerely,

GEORGE V. ALLEN,
Director.

EXPLANATION OF PROPOSED BILL AND ESTIMATE OF INCREASED ANNUAL COST

GENERAL

The proposed legislation is designed to provide the statutory basis for an improved Foreign Service personnel system for the U.S. Information Agency. It provides authority for a career category of officers to be known as Public Affairs officers paralleling the Foreign Service officers corps of the Department of State. In general, the proposed legislation will place the foreign service of the Agency on a basis equivalent with that of the Department of State and subject to the same statutory requirements and limitations.

The legislative proposals, if enacted into law, will meet a need that was foreseen by the President at the time of establishment of the Agency in 1953 by Reorganization Plan No. 8. At that time the President recognized that the limited personnel authorities granted to the new Agency under Reorganization Plan No. 8 and implementing executive orders were not adequate. In his message to the Congress transmitting the reorganization plan, the President said:

"While these [personnel] arrangements will enable the new Agency to function with reasonable effectiveness from the outset, I do not consider them permanently suitable."

The present proposal will for the first time give the Agency the personnel authorities necessary to establish its Foreign Service personnel system on a career basis. The limited personnel authorities now available to the Agency under Reorganization Plan No. 8 are totally inadequate to provide a career service for its professional officers.

Section 1: The new category of officers to be established by the legislation will be known as Public Affairs officers. They will be required to pass examinations and to meet qualifications and standards for appointment equivalent to those required for Foreign Service officers of the Department of State under the Foreign Service Act.

This section also provides that not more than 700 persons who have not served as Public Affairs officer in class 8 may be appointed as Public Affairs officer to classes 1 through 7. The Agency now has approximately 1,000 officers who are either Foreign Service Reserve officers, classes 1–7, or Foreign Service staff officers in equivalent grades. These officers will be invited to apply and required to meet standards and pass examinations of the same nature as those required for lateral entry into the Foreign Service officers corps of the Department of State. The Agency will select those officers who meet these strict requirements and who possess the best qualifications and the broad experience desired for its Public Affairs officers.

The exact number of present staff and Reserve officers who will apply for admission and who will pass the strict qualification requirements for appointment cannot be determined in advance. It is the Agency's best judgment that 700 to 800 of its present officers will meet the requirements and standards equivalent to those established by the Department of State for entrance into the Foreign Service officers corps. The agency, therefore, regards the proposed limitation of 700 appointments of Public Affairs officers to classes 1 through 7 as an interim control to assure observance of the highest standards in selection, but anticipates that it may be necessary to request an adjustment in this figure. If, as the number of lateral appointments of fully qualified officers approaches the figure of 700, the Agency can demonstrate that there are additional equally well qualified officers who cannot be appointed solely because of the limitation, the Agency will request the Congress for an appropriate increase in the limitation. The agency would take such action only if it is fully justified by experience and the record of achievement under the new legislation.

Plans for the Public Affairs officer corps will provide for appointment of junior officers at class 8. The Agency proposes that these junior officer appointments should not be charged against the limitation of 700 appointments to classes 1 through 7, since the Agency desires to provide a continuing source of highly qualified young officers for the Public Affairs officer corps through appointments at the entrance class. For the past several fiscal years, the Agency has appointed approximately 30 junior officers a year. The Agency would continue to appoint approximately 30 junior officers a year for the next several fiscal years if the proposed legislation were enacted.

Section 2: This section provides that the same authority which is or will be available by statute to the Secretary of State with respect to Foreign Service officers of the Department is available to the Director, USIA, with respect to Public Affairs officers, except as provided in succeeding sections of the new legislation. (The Director also retains, of course, the authority made available to him by the President with respect to Foreign Service Reserve officers, Foreign Service Staff officers and employees, and alien clerks and employees, under Executive orders implementing Reorganization Plan No. 8.)

Section 3: Certain provisions of the Foreign Service Act applicable to Foreign Service officers of the Department are not pertinent to Public Affairs officers. This section specifies the authorities of the act available to the Secretary of State, which are not available to the Director, USIA, with respect to Public Affairs officers. These include various provisions of the act which pertain, for example, to the Director General of the Foreign Service, chiefs of mission, career ambassadors, and career ministers and officers temporarily in charge of posts. The authority to designate hardship posts, vested by the Act in the Secretary of State, is also not available to the Director. The section of the act which specifies the membership of the Board of the Foreign Service of the Department of State is made inapplicable, since the membership of the Agency Board is covered separately by section 4 of the proposed legislation. The limitations on the number of lateral appointments to the Foreign Service Officers Corps at classes 1 through 7 are also not applicable to lateral appointments to the Public Affairs Officers Corps at those classes, since section 1 of the proposed legislation places a limit of 700 on lateral appointments of Public Affairs officers at classes 1 through 7.

Section 4: Two Boards are established to perform with respect to the Agency's Public Affairs officers the functions vested by the Foreign Service Act in the Board of the Foreign Service and Board of Examiners for the Foreign Service. Each USIA Board will be composed of two senior officers of the Agency and two senior officers of the Department. Examining panels and selection boards will also include an equal number of representatives of the Agency and the Department.

The direct participation of Department representatives will enable the Agency to benefit from the Department's long administration of a career officer system. It is believed that this participation will assure substantial uniformity between the two personnel systems, including such important aspects as examinations of personnel and standards for their selection and promotion.

Subsection (c) of this section also requires that the Director obtain the concurrence of the Secretary of State with respect to the Director's recommendations to the President for the appointment and promotion of Public Affairs officers. This requirement offers further assurance of uniformity between the Department and the Agency with regard to personnel administration.

Section 5: This section provides that the Director, when he considers it necessary to carry out the Agency's functions, may request the Secretary of State to recommend to the President that Public Affairs officers be commissioned to serve in a diplomatic or consular capacity. In this way, the Secretary of State retains responsibility for commissioning Agency personnel and for their assignment under such commissions in diplomatic or consular capacities. The Director retains authority over the assignment and transfer of Public Affairs officers in other than diplomatic or consular capacities.

These are the same procedures now followed in commissioning and assigning Foreign Service Reserve and Foreign Service staff officers of the Agency. No change in present arrangements is contemplated.

Section 6: Under this section the Director will establish and administer an independent retirement fund and system, pursuant to the provisions of title VIII of the Foreign Service Act, which creates a retirement system for Foreign Service officers. In setting up this system, the Agency will be guided by the experience of the Department of State and will follow to the greatest possible extent the regulations of the Department relating to its retirement system.

Section 7: As provided by this section, the Agency will take advantage of the experience of the Department in the administration of the Foreign Service officer corps and will pattern its regulations after those of the Department. Through the joint boards established under section 4 the Agency will maintain close coordination with the Department in regard to such matters as policies and precedures with respect to appointments, promotions, assignments, and separations. The Agency will continue to be bound by Government-wide regulations relating to allowances issued by the Department.

Section 8: Title VII of the Foreign Service Act is concerned with the establishment and operation of the Foreign Service Institute and with the general training and development of the personnel of the Foreign Service. This section makes it clear that the Agency will not have authority to establish an independent Foreign Service Institute to parallel that of the Department of State. The Agency will continue to make use of the facilities of the Foreign Service Institute of the Department under appropriate financial arrangements and will utilize those provisions of title VII which provide authority for the training and development of Foreign Service officers, in training and developing its Public Affairs officers. The provisions of title VII, which provide authority for the training and development of Foreign Service Reserve and Foreign Service staff officers, will continue to be available to the Agency under Reorganization Plan No. 8 and Executive Order 10477.

Estimate of increased annual cost, $125,000.

PROPOSED LEGISLATION RELATING TO SMALL BUSINESS TAXATION

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, during the 85th Congress the Senate Small Business Committee conducted a thorough study of the tax problems of small business. After extensive hearings, members of the committee introduced an omnibus small business tax adjustment bill.

Our bill provided the basis for much of the tax relief granted to small business by the Small Business Tax Revision Act of 1958. That act will, in my opinion, be very helpful to small business. However, it did only part of the job.

To give the Congress an opportunity to remove additional severe tax inequities toward small business, I am introducing separate bills that are directly related to four omnibus-bill provisions that were not written into law last year.

On January 9 I introduced S. 59, a bill that would permit small firms a deduction from taxable income for earnings plowed back into the business. This followed the principle of section 2 of last year's bill, but was not identical to it.

Today I am introducing three additional bills which are identical to sections 3, 5, and 8 in S. 3194 of the 85th Congress.

For myself, Senator HUMPHREY, Senator MORSE, Senator BIBLE, Senator RANDOLPH, Senator JAVITS, Senator JACKSON, and Senator YARBOROUGH, I introduce a bill written to eliminate one of the most severe areas of discrimination in the existing Federal tax structure. Under section 401 of the 1954 Internal Revenue Code, persons who are members of qualified pension, profit sharing, or stock bonus plans get great tax advantages in providing for retirement. They do not have to report as income funds placed in the plans by their company employer and treated by the company as a current expense. Only a small proportion of taxpayers and employees are favored with such treatment, and all other persons are at a substantial disadvantage in planning for their retirement.

The bill which I now introduce will extend an equal tax advantage to all taxpayers. It would permit all wage earners, employers, and self-employed persons not included in a section 401 plan to set up voluntary individual retirement programs by investing the lesser of 10 percent of taxable income or $1,000 in restricted bank accounts or insurance policies.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1009) to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 so as to encourage the establishment of voluntary retirement plans by individuals, introduced by Mr. SPARKMAN (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, my next bill is concerned with depreciation. There is no area of tax administration whch has received so much criticism as depreciation policy. It is an area which probably can never be completely freed from ambiguity and inequity, but there is one discriminatory feature which can be removed to the benefit of the whole system.

In 1954, Congress permitted purchasers of new property to adopt alternative depreciation methods that permitted more rapid recovery of asset cost in the years immediately following purchase. The use of the new methods was denied to purchasers of secondhand or used property. Because small concerns are the major purchasers and users of secondhand equipment, they were the unintended victims of discrimination when the 1954 election was given to buyers of new property.

We believe that this privilege should be extended also to purchasers of used equipment. Needless to say, most of these purchasers are small business men.

For myself, Senator HUMPHREY, Senator SMATHERS, Senator MORSE, Senator BIBLE, Senator RANDOLPH, Senator JAVITS, Senator JACKSON, and Senator YARBOROUGH, I now introduce a bill which will extend the alternative methods of depreciation to purchasers of secondhand equipment. This would eliminate a most unfair discrimination against small business users of secondhand property.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1010) to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 so as to permit the use of the new methods and rates of depreciation for used property, introduced by Mr. SPARKMAN (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, my final bill in this series of four would compel the Treasury to accept the decisions of Federal courts in tax matters or take an appeal. Now Treasury may nonacquiesce or formally disagree with a decision and force other taxpayers to refight old battles under the jurisdiction of different courts.

In past years, inconsistent interpretations of the Internal Revenue Code, resulting from the nonacquiescence of the Treasury in judicial rulings, have worked a great hardship on small business. In many cases involving small firms, the tax liability is relatively small, and, often, not worth the heavy expense of litigation. Taxpayers in such cases find it difficult to understand why the Treasury continues to press a position in defiance of a contrary ruling by the Tax Court or a United States court of appeals.

For myself, Senator HUMPHREY, Senator MORSE, Senator BIBLE, Senator RANDOLPH, Senator JACKSON, and Senator YARBOROUGH, I introduce an amendment to the Internal Revenue Code to compel acquiescence by the Treasury in judicial determinations of the Tax Court and the United States courts of appeals. Under this bill the Treasury would be protected by its right of appeal, and the taxpayers—both the one in litigation and others involved with the same question—would gain the advantage of finality and uniformity of treatment.

Mr. President, I cannot stress too emphatically that small business is in grave danger of becoming one of the unintended victims of our economic progress. Our admiration of bigness has almost become a national fetish. We tend to forget that our largest corporations, which today are household words, were at one time very small businesses indeed. Today growth is the key to business success. To stand still is to perish. One way to assure that our smaller companies can expand with the times is to make it possible for them to buy modern equipment, to modernize their factories and stores. Mr. President, they need money to do this and the best way to find this money is to be able to save a part of their profits to plow back into their businesses.

S. 59, which I introduced on January 9, provides for a tax allowance on a certain part of profits which are reinvested in the business. The bills which I have introduced today are further steps toward making it possible for our smaller companies to take advantage of much the same tax benefits which our largest companies enjoy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1011) to designate judicial precedents which shall be binding in the administration and enforcement of the internal revenue laws, introduced by Mr. SPARKMAN (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, since I am sure that many Senators share these views, I ask unanimous consent that each of the three bills that I have just introduced lie on the table 1 week for additional cosponsors.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TAX ADJUSTMENT PROGRAM FOR SMALL BUSINESS—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF BILL

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, in connection with the bill (S. 59) to provide a program of tax adjustment for small business and for persons engaged in small business, which I introduced on January 9, 1959, on behalf of myself and other Senators, I ask unanimous consent that the next printing or at the first opportunity, the name of the Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS] be added as an additional cosponsor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONTRIBUTION BY STATE GOVERNMENTS TO COST OF FEED OR SEED FURNISHED FARMERS IN DISASTER AREAS

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill the purpose of which is to require that in all emergency relief programs, such as drought relief, and so forth, underwritten by the Federal Government there shall be a minimum of 25 percent State or local participation.

Under the existing law the Federal Government is underwriting all of the cost of these emergency relief programs with the result that there is little incentive on the part of the State and local communities to supervise the distribution and to insure that the relief goes to those for whom it is intended.

It has been disclosed that under this program with non-State participation, millionaire ranchers, owners of racehorses, and other unqualified types of operations have been declared eligible for relief payments.

For instance, the fabulous King Ranch received several thousand dollars in relief with no objections being raised by the State administrators, presumably on the assumption that the Federal Government was assuming the cost anyway.

In another instance the owner of the racehorse Swaps even while his horse was winning the Belmont Sweepstakes was applying for and receiving relief payments.

One self-styled rancher with only a polo pony and a bird dog was drawing relief to feed his livestock.

Recognizing these abuses the administration in previous years strongly recommended this legislation but no action was taken.

This proposal should be enacted by Congress now. At the present time these programs are not being utilized; therefore, it would be much easier to make this correction now and be ready for a future situation should another emergency develop.

The outlining of a definite formula of State participation would put the State legislatures on notice as to the rules under which they could participate.

In the President's message to the Congress this year he again strongly recommended this proposal as being necessary from the standpoint of good administration as well as being a step toward turning back to the States those functions which can be best administered at local levels.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1013) to provide for a specific contribution by State governments to the cost of feed or seed furnished to farmers, ranchers, or stockmen in disaster areas, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

SCHOOL CONSTRUCTION ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1959 AND COLLEGE FACILITIES ACT OF 1959

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL], and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY], I introduce, for appropriate reference, two bills entitled "School Construction Assistance Act of 1959" and "College Facilities Act of 1959."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bills will be received and appropriately referred.

The bills, introduced by Mr. MORTON (for Mr. SALTONSTALL and Mr. PROUTY), were received, read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, as follows:

S. 1016. A bill to authorize a 5-year program of assistance to school districts in meeting the debt service on loans for construction of urgently needed elementary or secondary public school facilities, and for other purposes; and

S. 1017. A bill to assist institutions of higher education to market and retire bonds issued by them to finance the construction of college facilities.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bills lie on the desk through February 19 for the benefit of any Senators who may wish to become cosponsors.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MORTON. I also ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks a letter from Mr. Arthur S. Flemming, Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, and a statement by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL].

There being no objection, the letter and statement were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH,
EDUCATION, AND WELFARE,
Washington, D.C., February 9, 1959.

Hon. RICHARD M. NIXON,
President of the Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. VICE PRESIDENT: I enclose for your consideration two legislative proposals designed to strengthen American education in areas of recognized need.

One would assist States to overcome the persistent shortage of public elementary and secondary schools by making it possible for them to initiate up to $3 billion worth of construtcion, during the next 5 years, in communities which lack the resources to finance their own classroom needs.

The other, over the same period, would make it possible for institutions of higher education to accelerate construction of up to $2 billion worth of facilities which will be needed in the years immediately ahead to provide for the ever-increasing numbers of youth reaching college age.

Under the elementary and secondary school construction program, maximum annual Federal payments would be $85 million, and the aggregate potential cost would be about $2 billion over approximately 25 years. Under the higher education construction program, maximum annual payments would be $25 million for debt retirement assistance, and the aggregate Federal cost would be $500 million, payable over a 25-year period.

Our educational system is vitally related to the national strength and security. As we apply ourselves to the causes of security and peace, we must seek to develop our human resources to the fullest extent. We must make available for all our children and young people equal educational opportunities to realize their highest potential.

As a Nation, we must be willing to make the sacrifices which will be necessary to achieve these goals. We must redouble our efforts for adequate classroom facilities, improved quality of instruction, better status and salaries for teachers, and broadened support of education from the States, local governments, and private agencies.

Among our most critical educational problems, the one most readily resolved by vigorous action is the continuing shortage of adequate public schools and classrooms. There is no State in which this shortage is not felt in some degree. Adequate facilities for the education of our children must be provided in every State and every local school district.

In recent years, thousands of communities throughout the country have made strenuous efforts to meet their needs. Most of them are finding the means to eliminate their school construction backlogs and keep pace with expanding enrollments. Nevertheless, the nature and extent of the problem in many communities is such that they simply cannot meet their classroom needs from their own resources.

The population growth which has placed such a burden on our elementary and secondary schools is only beginning to make its impact felt in our institutions of higher education. Unless they greatly increase their current rate of construction and enlarge their capacity to absorb the oncoming wave of youths reaching college age, they will have to close their doors to many able young men and women in the years immediately ahead. Yet, many of these institutions do not have resources available for financing, without borrowing, the expansion of academic and housing facilities which must be begun now in order to meet the needs of the next decade. They are reluctant to add the burden of large scale indebtedness to the already heavy load they carry in meeting day-to-day operating expenses.

For our future progress and future survival, we must assure that our colleges and universities continue to produce highly educated men and women in sufficient numbers to meet the demands of our growing economy, maintain the vitality of our democratic processes, and uphold our position of leadership in the free world. The national interest demands that the opportunity for higher education will not be denied to any able young persons who may seek it.

In his budget message, the President stated his belief that the continued needs of colleges and universities should be considered within the framework of the general problems of education, and noted that this Department was concluding an exhaustive study of these problems. Accordingly, it is my privilege to transmit the legislative recommendations in the field of higher education arising from our study, together with our recommendations in the field of public elementary and secondary school construction. The enclosed draft bills would provide suitable and effective Federal assistance to assure the continued strength of American education.

I. PUBLIC ELEMENTARY AND SECONDARY SCHOOL CONSTRUCTION

A. The problem

According to the estimates of the States themselves, our public elementary and secondary schools today enroll almost 2 million pupils in excess of their normal capacity, while another 2 million pupils are housed in obsolete or inadequate buildings. These children are being shortchanged in their education by half-day sessions, seriously overcrowded classes, and makeshift facilities.

In addition to the thousands of classrooms needed to relieve currently overcrowded conditions, the States and local communities must find ways to construct several hundred thousand more classrooms in the years immediately ahead to accommodate increasing enrollments and replace obsolete structures.

If the present high rate of school construction could be maintained for the next 5 years, the national classroom deficit at the end of that period would still remain a national problem of major proportions. More than 2 million children would still be educationally underprivileged.

In our judgment, however, the current construction rate cannot independently be maintained. The present rate reflects the efforts of school districts with median or better-than-average resources—districts with the capacity to meet their classroom needs. Consequently, estimates of the construction backlog increasingly tend to represent the problems of communities that do not have resources commensurate with their needs. Such districts exist in every State. They will, by and large, remain unable to finance urgently needed construction in the immediate future.

It is no answer to say that, possibly, within the next decade or so, these districts may find ways to meet their needs. They must be helped to build now the classrooms which their children must have. The children cannot wait.

In focusing on the problem of the needy school districts, we propose a program that incorporates new and effective measures to assure that Federal aid is directed to those school districts which are urgently in need of additional classrooms that cannot be financed out of their own tax revenues.

B. The program

The program we propose is a 5-year emergency measure. Under the draft bill, the Federal Government would annually advance half of the funds required by needy school districts to pay the principal and interest charges (debt service) on bonds issued by the districts to finance school construction projects, if the States in which such districts are located undertake to advance the remaining half of the payments.

To participate in this program, the States would determine priorities among needy districts according to their relative need for facilities and financial assistance. In order to measure the capacity of the districts to finance their educational requirements, the States would establish standards for determining a "reasonable tax effort" for each applicant school district. The districts that qualify for assistance would be required to exert this effort each year for the life of their construction bonds and for 10 years thereafter, as assurance that they would continue to make the maximum contribution which they could reasonably be expected to make toward meeting their own needs from their existing and potential tax resources.

If at any time during the 20–30 year life of the construction bonds the tax resources of a community should increase or its other financial burdens diminish to such an extent that they become able to pay part or all of the debt service charges in a given year, Federal-State advances for that year would be reduced proportionately or discontinued. Likewise, in the 10-year period following retirement of the bonds, the district would apply half of any excess revenues which may be produced by exerting its "reasonable tax effort" to the repayment, with interest, of Federal advances previously made. Any Federal advances or interest which a district is unable to pay in this manner would be forgiven at the end of the 10-year period.

The proposed program would require relatively small annual appropriations by States which undertake, like the Federal Government, to advance half the annual debt service on amounts borrowed by their needy districts. Additional flexibility of financing would be achieved by a provision allowing the States to make capital grants in lieu of, or in combination with, debt service advances. Also, the States could either waive repayment of their advances after the retirement of the bonds, or could require repayment from excess revenues for any future period they may choose.

Under this bill, the maximum principal amount of bonded indebtedness which could be covered by Federal-State debt service commitments would be $600 million a year. This amount would be allocated to the States on the basis of school population, per capita income, and school financing effort. During the 5-year period in which commitments could be made, the program could thus initiate $3 billion worth of classroom construction in needy and deserving school districts. This total would contribute substantially toward meeting the critical needs of those districts which could not otherwise provide adequate educational facilities for their children.

In seeking to stimulate greater application of State and local resources toward the total solution of their educational problems, we have based this proposal on the fundamental principle that Federal assistance must not infringe upon the traditional responsibilities of the States and their communities for public education. The proposed bill assumes Federal responsibility only for temporary, emergency assistance to stimulate and hasten local action where the demand is most urgent. When school districts demonstrate that they can carry the burden unassisted, the Federal role ends.

II. HIGHER EDUCATION CONSTRUCTION

A. The problem

Our institutions of higher education—both public and private—are a vital national resource. We are dependent upon the existing colleges and universities to supply our national needs for highly trained manpower.

These institutions are experiencing mounting difficulties which markedly restrict the effectiveness of their vital national role. They must gradually replace the obsolete structures which make up a significant proportion of their total facilities. To attract and hold good faculties, they will have to increase salaries. It will be necessary for many of them to elevate, and for all of them to maintain, their standards of academic excellence. They must increase their output of qualified teachers, whose knowledge and skills are the indispensable elements of any sound educational system. Colleges and universities are presently straining their resources to satisfy the national demand for highly educated men and women in all walks of life. Now, they are asked in addition to prepare for the overwhelming enrollment increases expected in the next decade.

By 1970, the total number of qualified students seeking to enter our institutions of higher education will about double. This simple fact is the crux of the problem which the colleges and universities must confront and resolve if they are to continue to fulfill their national responsibilities.

To care adequately for these anticipated enrollment increases, they must almost double their present rate of construction. Few public or private institutions can pay for plant expansion out of available or readily procurable resources, and many are unwilling to undertake burdensome debt service costs in view of their other equally urgent educational priorities. Such institutions of higher education need help and encouragement to find ways to construct needed new facilities and replace those made unserviceable by obsolescence.

The example of the college housing loan program has already demonstrated that construction of facilities for higher education can be greatly stimulated by making it possible for the institutions to borrow on favorable terms and conditions to finance their capital outlay needs. Before the program was initiated in 1950, less than 30 percent of all college housing projects were financed by bond issues. In recent years, the level of construction contracted under the college housing program alone has risen to a plateau of $200 million a year, equaling 60 percent of the total annual rate of residential college construction. In contrast, borrowing accounts for only about 14 percent of the funds being raised for construction of academic facilities, which are not eligible for college housing loans.

B. The program

To accelerate construction of college and university facilities as required in the national interest, we propose new incentives for educational institutions to increase borrowing for construction equivalent to the incentives provided in the present college housing loan program. We also propose to broaden the base of Federal assistance to include the construction of vitally needed academic facilities—classrooms, libraries, laboratories, and related facilities for instruction, research or administration of educational or research programs—as well as housing facilities.

The draft bill would establish an emergency 5-year program which would include:

1. Federal guarantees of principal and interest on non-tax-exempt bonds sold by colleges to private investors to finance construction of housing, academic and related educational facilities. By assuring private lenders that debt service payments would be met as scheduled, the guarantee feature is expected to enable institutions that do not have the benefit of tax-exempt bond issuance to obtain a ready market for their bonds. The aggregate amount of guaranteed bonds outstanding at any one time would be limited to $1 billion.

2. Debt retirement assistance in the form of Federal commitments to pay 25 percent of the principal on long-term bonds issued by institutions of higher education to finance construction projects for needed housing, academic, or other educational facilities. Federal payments would be made in 20 equal annual installments. Debt retirement assistance would be limited to projects which would serve the national interest in increasing enrollment capacity or improving and expanding teaching and research in the sciences or engineering.

Aggregate Federal payments under the program would be limited to $500 million, representing 25 percent of a total principal construction cost of $2 billion. There would also be a $5 million limit on payments to any one institution. Only those institutions would be eligible which certify that they do not have resources available to finance their construction needs without borrowing.

The twofold program is expected to approximately triple the construction rate for academic facilities financed by borrowing, resulting in an annual rate equivalent to that of dormitory construction under the college housing loan program. Construction of college housing projects, meanwhile, would be expected to rise somewhat above the present level. By making long-term financing more readily available, this program would stimulate an aggregate of $2 billion worth of new and needed facilities constructed in time to enable our institutions of higher education to meet their national responsibilities in the years immediately ahead.

The legislative proposals I have outlined represent sound, progressive steps toward the solution of clearly defined educational needs. They are designed to promote a closer realization of the great goal of the American educational system: that all our citizens may have the opportunity to develop their talents to the fullest. Such a goal is an assertion of the basic faith of our democracy, that the Nation flourishes only through the free expression of human genius.

I recognize that fundamental differences of opinion exist as to the role of the Federal Government in education. I respect those differences. I am nonetheless convinced that these emergency proposals fully protect the traditional principle of State and local control of education, and are required by the particular necessities and urgencies of the educational task now confronting the Nation.

The enclosed summaries explain in greater detail the provisions of the proposed program. Also included are statements of cost estimates and personnel requirements which would be entailed, as required by Public Law 801, 84th Congress. I would appreciate it if you would refer the enclosed draft bills to the appropriate committee for consideration.

The Bureau of the Budget advises that enactment of the proposed legislation would be in accord with the program of the President.

Sincerely yours,

ARTHUR S. FLEMMING,
Secretary.

STATEMENT BY SENATOR SALTONSTALL

I think it is important that our country do what is necessary to assure that all our young people have an opportunity to obtain a first-rate education. This opportunity cannot exist unless we have adequate facilities at all levels of our educational system. The President has for several years been convinced that action by the Federal Government is necessary and desirable to help eliminate the present and predicted shortage of facilities.

This year's administration program to help overcome the shortage in elementary, secondary, and higher education facilities is designed to provide significant Federal assistance in such a way as to stimulate State, local, and private initiative and effort. The program is also designed to avoid any Federal Government interference in State, local, and private responsibility for education.

It is a program which deserves the thoughtful and sympathetic consideration of all of us who are concerned about American education.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point the two bills referred to, together with explanatory summaries.

There being no objection, the bills and summaries were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "School Construction Assistance Act of 1959."

ASSURANCE AGAINST FEDERAL INTERFERENCE IN SCHOOLS

SEC. 2. In the administration of this Act, no department, agency, officer, or employee of the United States shall exercise any direction, supervision, or control over the personnel, curriculum, or program of instruction of any school or school system.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 3. For the purpose of assisting school districts in financing the construction of urgently needed school facilities which they cannot, through exercise of a reasonable tax effort, finance from their own resources, there are hereby authorized to be appropriated for each fiscal year, beginning with the fiscal year ending June 30, 1960, such sums as may be necessary to make the payments provided in this Act.

ALLOCATIONS

SEC. 4. (a) (1) For each fiscal year during the five-year period beginning July 1, 1959, and ending June 30, 1964, such amounts, not to exceed $600,000,000, as may be specified for such year by appropriation or other law shall be allocated by the Commissioner among the States on the basis of the income per child of school age, the number of public school children, and the effort for school purposes, of the respective States. Subject to the provisions of section 5, such allocations shall be made as follows: The Commissioner shall allocate to each State for each fiscal year an amount which bears the same ratio to the total to be allocated among all States as the product of—

(A) the number of public school children in the State (determined as provided in section 5(c)(1) for such fiscal year), and

(B) the State's allocation ratio (as determined under subsection (b)), bears to the sum of the corresponding products for all the States.

(2) A State's allocation pursuant to paragraph (1) shall remain available until the end of the fiscal year following the year for which the allocation is made for Federal debt service commitments pursuant to section 7 with respect to obligations, to finance the construction of school facilities projects in such State, totaling the amount of such allocation. Such a commitment with respect to any obligations shall commit the Commissioner to make advances for payment of one-half the annual debt service on such obligations. Such obligations may be for the purpose of financing all or a portion of the construction of school facilities projects. The latest maturity date of obligations (in any issue) with respect to which a Federal debt service commitment is made under this Act may not be less than twenty years and not more than thirty years from the earliest date of any of such obligations and the first payment of principal thereon shall be due not later than the end of the third year following such earliest date.

(b) For purposes of this Act—

(1) The "allocation ratio" for any State shall be 1.00 less the product of (A) .50 and (B) the quotient obtained by dividing the income per child of school age for the State by the income per child of school age for the continental United States, except that (A) the allocation ratio shall in no case be less than .25 or more than .75, and (B) the allocation ratio for Hawaii shall be .50, and for Puerto Rico, Guam, and the Virgin Islands shall be .75.

(2)(A) The allocation ratios shall be promulgated by the Commissioner as soon as possible after enactment of this Act and again between July 1 and September 30 of the year 1961, on the basis of the average of the incomes per child of school age for the States and for the continental United States for the three most recent consecutive years for which satisfactory data are available from the Department of Commerce. The first such promulgation shall be conclusive for purposes of this Act for each of the fiscal years in the period beginning July 1, 1959 and ending June 30, 1962, and the second for each of the fiscal years in the period beginning July 1, 1962, and ending June 30, 1964.

(B) Promulgations made before satisfactory data are available from the Department of Commerce for a full year on the per capita income of Alaska shall prescribe an allocation ratio for Alaska of .75 and, for purposes of such promulgations, Alaska shall not be included as part of the "continental United States". Promulgations made thereafter but before per capita income data for Alaska for a full 3-year period are available from the Department of Commerce shall be based on satisfactory data available therefrom for Alaska for such one full year, or, when such data are available for 2-year period, for such years.

(3) The term "child of school age" means a member of the population between the ages of 5 and 17, both inclusive.

(4) The term "continental United States" does not include the District of Columbia.

(5) The term "income per child of school age" for any State or for the continental United States means the total personal income for the State and the continental United States, respectively, divided by the number of children of school age (in the State and continental United States, respectively).

MAINTENANCE OF STATE AND LOCAL SUPPORT FOR SCHOOL FINANCING

SEC. 5. (a) The allocation of any State under section 4 for any year shall be reduced by the percentage (if any) by which its State school effort index for such year is less than the national school effort index for such year. The total of such reductions shall be reallocated among the remaining States by proportionately increasing their allocations under section 4 for such year.

(b) For purposes of subsection (a)—

(1) The "State school effort index" for any State for a fiscal year is the quotient obtained by dividing (A) the State's school expenditures per public school child by (B) the income per child of school age for the State; except that the State school effort index shall be deemed to be equal to the national school effort index in the case of (i) Hawaii, Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, and Guam, (ii) Alaska, but only for years for which it is, under subsection (c)(4), not included in the "continental United States", and (iii) any State for which the school expenditures per public school child are not less than the school expenditures per public school child for the continental United States;

(2) The "national school effort index" for any fiscal year is the quotient obtained by dividing (A) the school expenditures per public school child for the continental United States by (B) the income per child of school age for the continental United States.

(c) (1) The school expenditures per public school child for any State for purposes of determining its State school effort index for any fiscal year means the quotient obtained by dividing (A) the total expenditures by the State and subdivisions thereof for elementary or secondary education made from funds derived from State or local sources in the State, as determined by the Commissioner on the basis of data for the most recent school year for which satisfactory data for the several States are available to him by (B) the number of children in average daily attendance in public elementary or secondary schools in such State, as determined by the Commissioner for such most recent school year.

(2) The school expenditures per public school child for the continental United States for purposes of determining the national school effort index for any fiscal year means the quotient obtained by dividing (A) the total expenditures by the States and subdivisions thereof for elementary or secondary education made from funds derived from State or local sources in the continental United States, as determined by the Commissioner for the same school year as is used under paragraph (1), by (B) the number of children in average daily attendance for such year in public elementary or secondary schools in the continental United States, determined as provided in paragraph (1).

(3) The income per child of school age for the States and for the continental United States shall, for purposes of subsection (b), be determined by the Commissioner on the basis of the incomes per child of school age for the most recent year for which satisfactory data are available from the Department of Commerce.

(4) The term "continental United States" shall not include Alaska for purposes of determinations made under this section before satisfactory data are available from the Department of Commerce for a full year on the per capita income of Alaska.

STATE PLANS

SEC. 6. Federal debt service commitments may be made under this Act with respect to obligations to finance the construction of school facilities in any State only if such State has submitted, and had approved under this section, a State plan. The Commissioner shall approve a State plan for purposes of this Act if such plan—

(a) provides that the State educational agency shall be the sole agency for administering the plan;

(b) provides that a local educational agency will be eligible for a Federal debt service commitment under this Act with respect to any obligations only if:

(1) such obligations are for financing, in whole or in part, the construction of school facilities needed to relieve or prevent overcrowding, double shifts, or unhealthful or hazardous conditions,

(2) such agency undertakes to exert the reasonable tax effort, determined for it under the plan, in financing its school construction needs,

(3) such agency will be unable, after exertion of such reasonable tax effort, and full utilization of other resources (whether from Federal, State, or local sources) available to it for financing its school construction needs and not taken into account for purposes of section 8(a), to pay the annual debt service on such obligations and other outstanding obligations of such agency for financing school construction,

(c) sets forth standards and procedures for determining the tax effort which each local educational agency applying for a Federal debt service commitment under this Act will be required, in order to be eligible, to exert in financing its school construction needs, which standards and procedures will assure that the tax effort so determined will be a reasonable one in the light of the resources actually or potentially subject to taxation by such agency, the relative local and State shares in financing school construction, and the tax effort exerted and the methods of financing used by other local educational agencies in the State;

(d) sets forth standards and procedures for determining the order of priority for projects under the plan in case the allocation of the State for any year under this Act is not adequate to permit the making, during the period for which such allocation is available, of all Federal debt service commitments requested by local educational agencies in the State; which standards and procedures shall assure (1) that the highest priority will be given to local educational agencies which are least able, solely because of lack of economic resources, to finance from the resources available to them the full cost of the school facilities needed to relieve or prevent overcrowding, double shifts, or unhealthful or hazardous conditions, and (2) that in other respects the order of priority will be based on relative need for financial aid in the construction of such school facilities and the relative urgency of the need for such facilities;

(e) provides for affording to every applicant whose application to be included in a State request under section 7 for a Federal debt service commitment is denied, an opportunity for a hearing before the State educational agency;

(f) provides for the establishment of standards on a State level for planning and construction of school facilities;

(g) provides that the State educational agency will make such reports to the Commissioner, in such form and containing such information, as are reasonably necessary to enable the Commissioner to perform his duties under this Act.

COMMITMENTS

SEC. 7. (a) In the case of each project for the construction of school facilities for a local educational agency to be financed by obligations for which the State educational agency requests a Federal debt service commitment under this Act, the State educational agency shall include in its request—

(1) a description of the school facilities project with respect to which the request is made and its estimate of the cost of construction of such project,

(2) the amount of the obligations which are to be covered by the commitment,

(3) a certification—

(A) that it has determined, in accordance with the standards and procedures in the State plan approved under section 6, that the local educational agency is eligible for such commitment with respect to such obligations and such project is entitled to priority over other projects within the State;

(B) that such project is consistent with any applicable State redistricting plans or policies and is in accord with applicable State construction laws and standards;

(C) if any portion of the cost of construction of such project is not to be met from the proceeds of such obligations, that the financing of such portion has been arranged;

(4) assurance, satisfactory to the Commissioner—

(A) that the local educational agency will take appropriate steps, including a public offering of the obligations, to secure the most favorable rate of interest and other terms for such obligations;

(B) that the local educational agency will, during each year in which such obligations are outstanding and for ten years thereafter, exert the reasonable tax effort, determined for it pursuant to the State plan, for financing its school construction needs, will certify to the Commissioner the amount of the revenues thereby produced, and will apply any surplus in such revenues to payment of the debt service on the obligations covered by such commitment or, after such obligations been have retired, will apply one-half of the surplus in such revenues to repayment of the Federal advances made under such commitment, plus interest on such advances, from the date the last one of such obligations (in an issue thereof) is retired, at the rate determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, with the other one-half of such surplus in such revenues being applied to repayment of the State debt service advances if and to the extent required by the State pursuant to section 8(b). For purposes of this subparagraph, (i) the existence and amount of any surplus in revenues produced by exercise of a reasonable tax effort shall be determined by adding to the revenues produced by the exercise of the reasonable tax effort any other resources available to the local educational agency for payments on account of debts incurred for construction of school facilities subtracting from the sum thereby obtained any payments made on account of debts incurred for such purpose, by the local educational agency before the request for the Federal debt service commitment here involved was filed by the State educational agency, and further subtracting therefrom any payments made on account of debts incurred for such purpose by the local educational agency after such filing but approved by the State educational agency upon a finding that the school facilities project for which such debts were incurred is needed to relieve or prevent overcrowding, double shifts, or unhealthful or hazardous conditions, and (ii) the rate of interest determined by the Secretary of the Treasury with respect to advances on any obligations shall be determined by him after taking into account the current average market yields on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States having maturities comparable to the period in which such advances are expected to be repaid.

(b) If the Commissioner finds that the request of a State educational agency for a Federal debt service commitment with respect to any obligations meets the requirements of subsection (a) and that the amount of such obligations does not exceed the amount remaining in the State's allocation or allocations available for the purpose, the Commissioner shall, subject to the provisions of section 8, make the Federal debt service commitment requested with respect to the obligations specified.

STATE DEBT SERVICE COMMITMENTS

SEC. 8. (a) No Federal debt service commitment may be made with respect to any obligations for financing, in whole or in part, the construction of a school-facilities project unless the State makes an equally binding commitment to pay one-half of the debt service on such obligations; except that the State may make a capital grant to cover part of the cost of such construction, in which case the Federal debt-service commitment with respect to so much of such obligations as do not exceed the amount of such capital grant shall be to pay the full annual debt service thereon.

(b) A State may, after the 10th year following the year in which obligations with respect to which a Federal debt service commitment has been made are retired, require repayment, with or without interest, of all or any portion of the amounts paid by the State pursuant to its debt service commitment and not already repaid, but only to the extent the local educational agency is able to do so through the exercise of the reasonable tax effort determined for it pursuant to the State plan and use of other resources available to it for payment of debts incurred for construction of school facilities.

STATES EXCLUSIVELY RESPONSIBLE FOR SCHOOL CONSTRUCTION FINANCING

SEC. 9. If exclusive responsibility for the financing of the construction of school facilities in any State, or in any portion of a State, has been assumed by the State, the Commissioner may, to the extent he deems such action necessary to achieve the purposes of this act, modify or make inapplicable to such State or portion thereof, as the case may be, any of the provisions of this act which he determines to be inappropriate by reason of the absence of a local educational agency or agencies responsible for such financing.

PAYMENT OF FEDERAL ADVANCES

SEC. 10. The Commissioner shall from time to time pay in advance or otherwise, to such agency or person or persons as may be designated in the request of a State agency pursuant to section 7 with respect to any obligations, the Federal advances for each year under the Federal debt service commitment under this act with respect to such obligations. Such advances for any year shall be reduced by the amount, if any, which the local educational agency issuing such obligations has applied, as provided in section 7(a)(4), to the annual debt service payments due in such year.

FAILURE OF LOCAL EDUCATIONAL AGENCY TO EXERT REASONABLE TAX EFFORT

SEC. 11. If any local educational agency with respect to whose obligations a Federal debt service commitment under this act has been made fails, during any period prior to the end of the 10th year after the year in which such obligations are retired, to exert the reasonable tax effort determined for it under the State plan, such agency shall be obligated to repay to the United States the additional amount it would have applied toward payment of the annual debt service on such obligations or toward repayment of the Federal advances (plus interest) as provided in section 7(a)(4), as the case may be, had such agency exerted such a tax effort.

ABANDONMENT OF PROJECTS

SEC. 12. If any project financed by obligations with respect to which a Federal debt service commitment has been made under this act, is abandoned or is not completed within a reasonable period, determined under regulations of the Commissioner, after such obligations have been sold, the United States shall be entitled to recover from the State in which such project is located or from the local educational agency issuing such obligations, or both, the amount of the advances which the United States made with respect to such obligations or such lesser amount as may be reasonable under the circumstances (as determined by agreement of the parties or by action brought in the Federal district court for the district in which such project is located.)

LABOR STANDARDS

SEC. 13. (a) The Commissioner shall not make any commitment under this act with respect to obligations to finance the construction of any school facilities project, except upon adequate assurance that all laborers and mechanics employed by contractors or subcontractors in the performance of work on such project will be paid wages at rates not less than those prevailing on similar construction in the locality as determined by the Secretary of Labor in accordance with the Davis-Bacon Act, as amended (40 U.S.C. 276a–276a 5), and will receive compensation at a rate not less than one and one-half times the basic rate of pay for all hours worked in any workweek in excess of eight hours in any workday or forty hours in the workweek, as the case may be.

(b) The Secretary of Labor shall have, with respect to the labor standards specified in subsection (a) of this section, the authority and functions set forth in Reorganization Plan Numbered 14 of 1950 (15 F. R. 3176; 64 Stat. 1267), and section 2 of the Act of June 13, 1934, as amended (40 U.S.C. 267c).

ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS

SEC. 14. (a) The Commissioner, in addition to other powers conferred by this Act, shall have power to agree to modifications of Federal debt service commitments made under this Act and of obligations with respect to which such commitments have been made and to pay, compromise, waive, or release any right, title, claim, lien, or demand, however arising or acquired under this Act; except that nothing in this subsection shall be construed to affect the power of the Attorney General in the conduct of litigation arising under this Act.

(b) Financial transactions of the Commissioner in making Federal debt service commitments, and payments with respect thereto, pursuant to this Act, and vouchers approved by the Commissioner in connection with such financial transactions, shall be final and conclusive upon all officers of the Government; except that all such transactions shall be subject to audit by the General Accounting Office at such times and in such manner as the Comptroller General may by regulation prescribe.

SUITS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES

SEC. 15. Any holder of obligations with respect to which a Federal debt service commitment has been made under this Act may bring suit against the United States to enforce any duty of the Commissioner under this Act or any undertaking of the Commissioner pursuant to a commitment under this Act. In any action arising under this Act to which the United States is a party, the district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction, without regard to the amounts involved. Such action shall be brought in the district court of the United States for the judicial district in which the plaintiff, or any of the plaintiffs if there are more than one, resides, or has his principal place of business or, if he does not have his principal place of business within any such judicial district, in the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 16. For purposes of this Act—

(a) The term "Commissioner" means the (United States) Commissioner of Education.

(b) The term "State" includes Hawaii, Puerto Rico, Guam, and the Virgin Islands.

(c) The term "State educational agency" means the State board of education or other agency or officer primarily responsible for the State supervision of public elementary or secondary schools, or (if different) the officer or agency primarily responsible for State construction or supervision of construction of such schools, whichever may be designated by the Governor or by State law.

(d) The term "local educational agency" means a board of education or other legally constituted local school authority having administrative control and direction of public education in a city, county, township, school district, or political subdivision in a State. If a separate local public authority has responsibility for the provision or maintenance of school facilities for any local educational agency or the financing of the construction thereof, thereof, such term includes such other authority.

(e) The term "debt service" means the aggregate amount required to pay the interest on and principal of each issue of obligations.

(f) The term "annual debt service" means the aggregate amount required to pay the interest on and principal of each issue of obligations becoming due in each successive twelve-month period, designated in accordance with regulations of the Commissioner.

(g) The term "school facilities" includes classrooms and related facilities for public elementary or secondary education; initial equipment, machinery, and utilities necessary or appropriate for school purposes; and interests in land (including site, grading, and improvement) on which such facilities are constructed. Such term does not include athletic stadiums, or structures or facilities intended primarily for events, such as athletic exhibitions, contests, or games, for which admission is to be charged to the general public.

(h) The terms "construct", "constructing", and "construction" include the preparation of drawings and specifications for school facilities; erecting, building, acquiring, altering, remodeling, improving, or extending school facilities; and the inspection and supervision of the construction of school facilities.

(i) The term "obligations" means any bonds, notes, interim certificates, debentures, certificates of indebtedness, or other evidence of indebtedness.

WITHHOLDING OF FUNDS AND JUDICIAL REVIEW

SEC. 17. (a) Whenever the Commissioner, after reasonable notice and opportunity for hearing to the State educational agency, finds that—

(1) the State plan approved under section 6 has been so changed that it no longer complies with the requirements of such section; or

(2) in the administration of the plan there is a failure to comply substantially with any such requirement; the Commissioner shall notify such State agency that no further Federal debt service commitments will be made under this Act with respective obligations to finance the construction of school facilities projects in the State (or, in his discretion, that further commitments will not be made for projects in the State affected by such failure), until he is satisfied that there will no longer be any such failure. Until he is so satisfied the Commissioner shall make no further Federal debt service commitments with respect to projects in such State under this Act, or shall limit commitments to projects with respect to which there is no such failure).

(b) (1) If any State is dissatisfied with the Commissioner's action under subsection (a) of this section, such State may appeal to the United States court of appeals for the circuit in which such State is located. The summons and notice of appeal may be served at any place in the United States.

(2) The findings of fact by the Commissioner, unless substantially contrary to the weight of the evidence, shall be conclusive; but the court, for good cause shown, may remand the case to the Commissioner to take further evidence, and the Commissioner may thereupon make new or modified findings of fact and may modify his previous action. Such new or modified findings of fact shall likewise be conclusive unless substantially contrary to the weight of the evidence.

(3) The court shall have jurisdiction to affirm the action of the Commissioner or to set it aside, in whole or in part. The judgment of the court shall be subject to review by the Supreme Court of the United States upon certiorari or certification as provided in title 28, United States Code, section 1254.

UTILIZATION OF OTHER AGENCIES

SEC. 18. In administering the provisions of this Act, the Commissioner is authorized to utilize the services and facilities of any agency of the Federal Government, in accordance with agreements between the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare and the head thereof. Payment for such services and facilities shall be made in advance or by way of reimbursement, as may be agreed upon by the Secretary and the head of the agency concerned.

DELEGATION OF COMMISSIONER'S FUNCTIONS

SEC. 19. The Commissioner is authorized to delegate any of his functions under this Act, except the making of regulations, to any officer or employee of the Office of Education.

APPROPRIATION FOR ADMINISTRATION

SEC. 20. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated for each fiscal year such sums as may be necessary for administration of this Act.

SUMMARY OF ELEMENTARY OR SECONDARY SCHOOL CONSTRUCTION PROPOSAL

GENERAL

The bill would authorize a 5-year program of assistance to needy school districts in meeting the debt service (i. e. annual installments of principal and interest) on bonds or other obligations issued to finance construction of urgently needed elementary or secondary public school facilities. This assistance would be in the form of Federal advances to pay one-half the annual debt service on such bonds, with the State's advancing the other half.

PROHIBITION AGAINST FEDERAL CONTROL

Federal interference, in the administration of the bill, with the personnel, curriculum, or program of any school would be prohibited.

ALLOCATIONS

The bill provides for allocating amounts each year among the States to serve as maximums on the school construction bonds on which the Federal Government would undertake to make advances. This maximum for a State would apply for the year for which the allocation was made, but any part of it not used in that year would be available for the same purpose for the next year (along with the new allocation for that year).

The total available for allocation among the States for this purpose for any year would be the amount, not exceeding $600 million, specified in appropriation or other law for such year.

The allocations to the States would be made on the basis of three factors—the relative State income per child of school age, the relative number of public school children, and the relative State effort for school purposes. Subject to adjustment on account of the State's school effort index, each State's allocation for the year would be equal to an amount bearing the same ratio to the total available for allocation for that year as the product of (1) the number of children in average daily attendance in public elementary or secondary schools in the State multiplied by (2) the State's allocation ratio, bears to the sum of the corresponding products for all the States.

A State's allocation ratio would depend on the income per child of school age for the State as compared with the income per child of school age for the United States, with the ratio for the State at the national average being 0.50 and the ratios for the other States varying inversely with their relative incomes per child of school age between a minimum of 0.25 and a maximum of 0.75.

The income per child of school age for any State would be the total personal income for the State divided by the number of school-age children in the State. The income per child of school age for the continental United States would be similarly computed.

The allocation ratios are to be promulgated as soon as possible after enactment of the bill and again in the third calendar quarter of 1961. They will be based on data averaged for the three most recent consecutive years for which satisfactory data are available from the Department of Commerce. The first promulgation will be conclusive for the period from July 1, 1959 through June 30, 1962, and the second for the period from July 1, 1962, through June 30, 1964.

Special provisions are provided for Alaska prior to the time satisfactory per capita income data are available for it. Before such data are available for a full year, Alaska's allocation ratio wil be 0.75.

STATE SCHOOL EFFORT INDEX

Allocations determined as provided above would be reduced by the percentage (if any) that the State's school effort index was less than the national index; and the total of the reductions would be added to the allocations of the States not so reduced, in proportion to their original allocations for the year, determined as provided above.

A State's school effort index would be determined on the basis of the ratio of school expenditures per child in average daily attendance in public elementary or secondary schools to the State's income per child of school age. The national index would be based on these figures for the continental United States (which excludes the District of Columbia and, for a temporary period, Alaska).

The State and national indexes would be deemed equal for Hawaii, Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, and Guam and for any State whose expenditures per child in average daily attendance in public elementary or secondary schools were not less than those for the continental United States. This assumed equality would also apply temporarily in the case of Alaska.

The school expenditures referred to above would include expenditures by States and subdivisions thereof for elementary or secondary education made from funds derived from State or local sources. These would be determined by the Commissioner of Education for the most recent school year for which satisfactory data from the States are available to him. The number of children in average daily attendance would be similarly determined.

The income per child of school age for the States and the continental United States (mentioned above) would be determined on the basis of data for the most recent year for which satisfactory data are available from the Department of Commerce.

STATE PLANS

Before the Commissioner could undertake to make Federal debt service advances on bonds or other obligations issued to finance the construction of schools in any State, the State would have to submit and have approved a State plan which provides for administration by the State educational agency.

The State plan would provide for limiting the Federal (and State) advances to local educational agencies which undertake to exert a reasonable tax effort (determined under the plan) in financing their school construction needs, and which would be unable, if they exerted this reasonable tax effort and fully utilized resources from all sources to pay the debt service on bonds issued to finance the buildings they need. Federal (and State) advances must also be limited to bonds issued to finance the construction of urgently needed schools, i.e., schools needed to relieve or prevent overcrowding, double shifts, or unhealthful or hazardous conditions.

The plan would set forth standards and procedures for determining a reasonable tax effort for each applicant local educational agency. The standards and procedures would assure that the tax effort so determined will be a reasonable one in the light of the taxable resources of the local educational agencies, the local and State shares in financing school construction, and the tax effort and methods of financing used by local educational agencies in the State. An approvable plan would also set forth priority standards and procedures which assure that the highest priority will be accorded to local educational agencies which are least able to finance the full cost of urgently needed school facilities, and that the order of priority will in other respects be based on relative need for financial aid in construction of such facilities and relative urgency of need for such facilities.

Finally, approvable State plans would provide for establishment of State standards for planning and construction of school facilities, for affording an opportunity for a hearing to unsuccessful project applicants, and for the making of the reports to the Commissioner of Education which he needs to administer the act.

DEBT SERVICE COMMITMENTS

For each local educational agency whose application is approved, the Commissioner would make a Federal debt service commitment obligating the Federal Government to make advances for payment of one-half of the annual debt service on the obligations covered. These obligations could be to finance all or a portion of the construction of a school facilities project. The latest maturity of obligations, in any issue thereof, would have to occur in 20 to 30 years, with the first payment of principal due before the end of the third year after issuance.

Applications of local educational agencies would be submitted by the State educational agency to the Commissioner with a request for a Federal debt service commitment. The State would certify that—

(1) the local educational agency is eligible for the commitment and the construction project is entitled to priority over other projects in the State under the standard priority standards and procedures in the State plan;

(2) the project is consistent with applicable State redistricting plans or policies and is in accord with applicable State construction laws and standards; and

(3) the financing of any portion of the cost of the project which is not to be financed from obligations covered by the commitment, has been arranged.

The State educational agency would also have to accompany its request for the commitment with satisfactory assurance that the local educational agency will take appropriate steps to secure the most favorable rate of interest and other terms for the obligations to be issued to finance the construction of the project, and that the local educational agency will, during the life of the obligations and for 10 years thereafter, exert the tax effort determined to be reasonable under the State plan and apply any surplus of revenues thereby produced to payment of the debt service on the obligations until they are retired.

After the obligations are retired, one-half the surplus produced during the next 10 years would have to be applied to repayment of the advances made under the Federal debt service commitment, plus interest from the date of retirement of these obligations, the interest rate to be based on the rate for Federal obligations having maturities comparable to the 10-year repayment period; if one-half the surplus produced during this period does not suffice to repay the Federal advances plus interest, repayment would be forgiven. The other one-half of the surplus would be used to repay the State debt service advances or would be retained by the local educational agency in case the State did not require repayment.

The amount of the "surplus" produced by the local educational agency's reasonable tax effort would be the amount which remained after applying the proceeds of this effort (and any other resources available to the agency for paying school construction debts) to payment of financing charges on school construction debts incurred prior to the request for Federal assistance, and on debts for school facilities projects incurred after the request but approved by the State educational agency as being needed to prevent or relieve overcrowding, double shifts, or unhealthful or hazardous conditions.

STATE MATCHING REQUIREMENTS

No Federal debt service commitment could be made under the bill to advance half the debt service on any obligations unless the State made an equal commitment to advance the other half. However, instead of so committing itself, the State could make a capital grant covering a portion of the cost of the construction project; in such case the Federal debt service commitment would be to pay the full annual debt service on so much of the obligations issued to finance the rest of such cost as did not exceed the amount of the capital grant by the State. The Federal Government and the State would share equally in the annual debt service payments on any remaining obligations.

The State educational agency could make its commitment to advance one-half the debt service on obligations of a local educational agency without requiring any repayment by the latter. Or it could require that all or any part of its advances of debt service to be repaid (with or without interest), after the obligations have been retired, from the surplus proceeds produced by exercise of a reasonable tax effort and the use of other resources available for school construction financing purposes. During the first ten years after retirement of the obligations, of course, this repayment would be made through sharing with the Federal Government in the surplus proceeds of the local educational agency. Thereafter the full surplus could be applied to repayment of the State advances.

PAYMENT OF FEDERAL ADVANCES

Advances by the Commissioner of Education on the Federal Government's one-half of the annual debt service on obligations covered by any Federal debt service commitment would be made by the Commissioner from time to time, in advance or otherwise, to the agency, person, or persons designated in the State educational agency's request for the Federal debt service commitment. As previously indicated, advances in any year would be reduced to the extent of any surplus revenues produced through exercise of the required reasonable tax effort and applied toward such debt service.

STATES EXCLUSIVELY RESPONSIBLE FOR SCHOOL CONSTRUCTION FINANCING

In some States or Territories, a State agency may have exclusive responsibility for financing the construction of school facilities. In others, a State agency may have exclusive responsibility for financing such construction for particular areas, such as unorganized territory. The Commissioner would be authorized to modify or make inapplicable to such State, or area of a State, any provisions of the bill which he determined to be inappropriate by reason of the absence of a local educational agency or agencies responsible for school construction financing, to the extent he deemed such action necessary in order to achieve the purposes of the bill.

FAILURE TO EXERT REASONABLE TAX EFFORT

If any local educational agency with respect to whose obligations a Federal debt service commitment has been made falls, in any period during the life of the obligations and the 10 years thereafter, to exert the reasonable tax effort required pursuant to the State plan, it would be obligated to repay to the United States the additional amount it would have paid toward the annual debt service (or toward repayment of the Federal advances, plus interest) for the period involved had it exerted the required reasonable tax effort.

ABANDONMENT OF FACILITIES

The Federal advances (or such lesser amount as may be determined to be reasonable by agreement or Federal district court suit) would have to be repaid to the United States if the construction of facilities financed by obligations with respect to which the Federal advances were paid is abandoned or not completed within a reasonable time.

LABOR STANDARDS

The Commissioner would not be able to make a Federal debt service commitment for financing the construction of school facilities except upon assurance that labor standards, relating to payment of prevailing wages and overtime pay for work in excess of 40 hours per week or 8 hours per day, would be observed in such construction.

ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS

The Commissioner would be authorized to agree to modifications of Federal debt service commitments and of the obligations with respect to which commitments have been made. He would also be authorized to waive or compromise claims. His financial transactions under the bill, while subject to audit by the General Accounting Office, would be conclusive on all other Government officials.

COURT ACTION

Suits would be authorized in the district courts of the United States by any person holding bonds covered by a Federal debt service commitment, to enforce any undertaking of the Commissioner under the commitment.

DEFINITIONS

A number of terms used in the bill are defined. These terms are Commissioner, State, State educational agency, local educational agency, debt service, annual debt service, school facilities, obligations, and construct, constructing, and construction.

WITHHOLDING OF FUNDS AND JUDICIAL REVIEW

Notice and hearing to the State educational agency would be required before Federal debt service commitments to the State could be suspended for failure to comply with the required provisions of approved State plans. A State agency dissatisfied with such suspension could obtain judicial review thereof in the Federal circuit court of appeals.

MISCELLANEOUS

Utilization of other Federal agencies in administration of the bill would also be authorized, as would be delegation of the Commissioner of Education's functions under the bill to personnel of the Office of Education.

S. 1017

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "College Facilities Act of 1959".

GUARANTY CONTRACTS

SEC. 2. (a) The Commissioner of Education (hereafter referred to as the "Commissioner") may, prior to June 30, 1964, enter into a contract, to be known as a Debt Service Guaranty Contract, pursuant to which the Commissioner may guarantee the payment of the principal of and interest on the bonds of an educational institution if the income from such bonds is subject to Federal taxation and the bonds are to be issued and sold to investors other than the United States in financing the development cost of housing, academic, or other educational facilities. The Debt Service Guaranty Contract shall obligate the Commissioner, so long as such bonds are outstanding, to pay to a trustee or other designated depository under an indenture securing the bonds, such amounts which, when added to the moneys available from the revenues or funds pledged by such institution as security for the bonds (including all reserve funds therefor), may be needed to make the payments due on the bonds. The aggregate principal amount of such guaranteed bonds outstanding at any one time shall not exceed $1,000,000,000.

(b) (1) There is hereby established for the purposes of this section a fund to be known as the College Facilities Guaranty Fund.

(2) All fees received in connection with guaranties issued under this section, all funds borrowed from the Secretary of the Treasury pursuant to subsection (d), all earnings on the assets of the College Facilities Guaranty Fund, all appropriations for carrying out functions under this section, and all other receipts of the Commissioner in connection with the performance of his functions under this section, shall be deposited in the Fund. All payments to trustees or other designated depositories under subsection (a), repayments to the Secretary of the Treasury of sums borrowed from him pursuant to subsection (d), and all administrative expenses and any other expenses of the Commissioner in connection with the performance of his functions under this section shall be paid from the Fund. Moneys in the Fund may be invested in bonds or other obligations of the United States, or in bonds or other obligations guaranteed as to principal and interest thereby, or in obligations which are lawful investments for fiduciary, trust, or public funds, the investment or deposit of which is under the authority and control of the United States or any officer or officers thereof. Such obligations may be sold and the proceeds derived therefrom may be reinvested, as herein provided, if deemed advisable by the Commissioner. Income from such investment or reinvestment shall be deposited in the Fund.

(c) The Commissioner is authorized to charge and collect a fee, as a consideration for the Government's guaranty of the loan, to cover administrative and other expenses in carrying out his functions under this section and to establish a reserve for losses. Such fee may be included in the amount of the bonds guaranteed.

(d) To carry out the purposes of this section the Commissioner is authorized to issue to the Secretary of the Treasury from time to time notes or other obligations for purchase by the Secretary of the Treasury in amounts sufficient, together with any funds in the College Facilities Guaranty Fund, to meet obligations of the Fund including payments of principal and interest on all bonds guaranteed under this section in accordance with the debt service guaranty contract. Such notes or other obligations shall be in such forms and denominations, have such maturities, and be subject to such terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the Commissioner with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. Such notes or other obligations shall bear interest at a rate determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, taking into consideration the current average market yields on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States having comparable maturities. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to purchase any notes and other obligations of the Commissioner issued under this section and for such purpose is authorized to use as a public-debt transaction the proceeds from the sale of any securities issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, and the purposes for which securities may be issued under such Act, as amended, are extended to include any purchases of such notes and other obligations. The Secretary of the Treasury may at any time sell any of the notes or other obligations acquired by him under this section. All redemptions, purchases, and sales by the Secretary of the Treasury of such notes or other obligations shall be treated as public-debt transactions of the United States.

(e) In the performance of, and with respect to, the functions, powers, and duties vested in him by this section, the Commissioner, notwithstanding the provisions of any other law, shall—

(1) prepare annually and submit a budget program as provided for wholly owned Government corporations by the Government Corporation Control Act, as amended; and

(2) maintain an integral set of accounts which shall be audited annually by the General Accounting Office in accordance with the principles and procedures applicable to commercial transactions as provided by the Government Corporation Control Act, as amended, and no other audit shall be required: Provided, That such financial transactions of the Commissioner as the making of debt service guaranty contracts and vouchers approved by the Commissioner in connection with such financial transactions shall be final and conclusive upon all officers of the Government.

(f) In the performance of, and with respect to, the functions, powers, and duties vested in him by this section, the Commissioner, notwithstanding the provisions of any other law, may—

(1) prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this section;

(2) sue and be sued;

(3) foreclose on any property or commence any action to protect or enforce any right conferred upon him by any law, contract, or other agreement, and bid for and purchase at any foreclosure or any other sale any property in connection with which he has made a debt service guaranty contract pursuant to this section; in the event of any such acquisition, the Commissioner may, notwithstanding any other provision of law relating to the acquisition, handling, or disposal of real property by the United States, complete, administer, remodel and convert, dispose of, lease and otherwise deal with, such property: Provided, That any such acquisition of real property shall not deprive any State or political subdivision thereof of its civil or criminal jurisdiction in and over such property or impair the civil rights under the State or local laws of the inhabitants on such property;

(4) enter into agreements to pay annual sums in lieu of taxes to any State or local taxing authority with respect to any real property so acquired or owned;

(5) sell or exchange at public or private sale, or lease, real or personal property, and sell or exchange any securities or obligations, upon such terms as he may fix;

(6) obtain insurance against loss in connection with property and other assets held;

(7) subject to the specific limitations in this section, consent to the modification, with respect to the rate of interest, time of payment of any installment of principal or interest, security, or any other term of any contract or agreement to which he is a party or which has been transferred to him pursuant to this section; and

(8) include in any contract or instrument made pursuant to this section such other covenants, conditions, or provisions as he may deem necessary to assure that the purposes of this section will be achieved.

(g) Section 3709 of the Revised Statutes shall not apply to any contract for services or supplies on account of any property acquired pursuant to this section if the amount of such contract does not exceed $1,000.

DEBT RETIREMENT ASSISTANCE

SEC. 3. (a) The Commissioner may, prior to June 30, 1964, make a commitment, to be known as a debt-retirement assistance commitment, to an educational institution to pay an amount equal to 25 percent of the principal of any bonds which (1) are issued and sold by such institution to investors other than the United States to finance the development cost of housing, academic, or other educational facilities, (2) are to be repaid by the institution over a period of not less than 20 years or more than 50 years, and (3) are to be repaid in installments of principal and interest which, during the first 20 years after the principal first becomes repayable, are substantially equal. The debt-retirement assistance commitment shall obligate the Commissioner to pay to the institution (or, if the institution so requests, to a trustee or other designated depository, under an indenture securing the bonds) such 25 percent in 20 equal annual installments, except that he may discontinue such installments after any year in which the institution accelerates repayment of such bonds under circumstances which would, in his judgment, defeat the purposes of this section. The Commissioner shall not make any debt-retirement assistance commitment unless the amount of annual payment required under such commitment, plus the aggregate of the annual payments required under all debt-retirement assistance commitments entered into previously, does not exceed the specific limitations on such payments provided in appropriation acts. The aggregate payments which may be made under this section shall not exceed $500 million, and the aggregate payments which may be made with respect to the bonds of any one educational institution shall not exceed $5 million.

(b) An institution shall be eligible for a debt-retirement assistance commitment only if the Commissioner finds—

(1) that the construction (including any land acquisition or site improvements in connection therewith) with respect to which the commitment is made, (A) alone, or together with other construction to be undertaken within a reasonable time, will substantially expand the student enrollment capacity of such institution, or (B) is needed to prevent a substantial decrease in such capacity, or (C) is for facilities for instruction or research in the natural sciences or engineering.

(2) that such construction and any land acquisition or site-development in connection therewith, and the financing thereof, will be undertaken in an economical manner, and that such construction will not be of elaborate or extravagant design or materials.

(3) that the institution has certified that it cannot by using resources already available to it for financing its construction needs finance any portion of the development cost of such construction, for which portion it seeks debt retirement assistance under this section, except through borrowing on terms meeting the conditions specified in the first sentence of subsection (a).

SUMMARY OF HIGHER EDUCATION CONSTRUCTION PROPOSAL

Section 1. Short title: This would be the "College Facilities Act of 1959."

Section 2. Guaranty contracts: This section would establish a program of Federal guarantees of bonds of educational institutions, the income of which is subject to Federal taxation, to assist these institutions in financing housing, academic, and related educational facilities.

Under this program the bonds issued by educational institutions to finance the construction of these facilities would be backed by the credit of the United States through the medium of debt service guarantee contracts pursuant to which the Commissioner of Education would guarantee payment of the debt service on such bonds as long as they remained outstanding. By assuring private lenders that the debt service payments would be met as scheduled, the proposed legislation, if enacted, is expected to be helpful in assisting these educational institutions to obtain funds in the private market on reasonable terms.

Subsection (a) would authorize the Commissioner of Education, for the period ending June 30, 1964, to enter into contracts pursuant to which he would undertake to guarantee payment of the debt service on bonds sold by eligible colleges and universities to investors other than the United States. The guarantee would cover the debt service on such bonds, to the extent that the pledged revenues prove inadequate. The aggregate amount of such guaranteed bonds outstanding at any one time would be limited to $1 billion.

Subsection (b) would establish a revolving college facilities guarantee fund which would be used by the Commissioner to finance the costs, including administrative expenses, involved in carrying out the bond guarantee program. All receipts of the Commissioner in carrying out his function under this new program would be deposited in this fund and all expenses of the program would be paid from the fund. Moneys in the fund not immediately needed in the operation of the program could be invested in obligations of the United States or obligations which are guaranteed by the United States or obligations which are lawful investments for federally supervised fiduciary, trust, or public funds.

Subsection (c) would authorize the Commissioner to charge and collect a guarantee fee to cover all expenses of the program and to establish a reserve for possible losses. Such fee may be included in the amount of the bonds guaranteed.

Subsection (d) would authorize the Commissioner, in case moneys in the fund are insufficient to meet the obligations of the fund, to borrow from the Secretary of the Treasury the additional amounts needed to meet the fund's obligations, including the principal of and interest on bonds guaranteed pursuant to the provisions of the debt service guarantee contract. The interest rate on Treasury borrowings would be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, taking into consideration yields on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States with comparable maturities.

Subsections (e), (f), and (g) are technical provisions directing or authorizing the Commissioner to perform functions necessary in the administration of the guarantee program. These provisions are modeled upon similar provisions in the college housing title (title IV) of the Housing Act of 1950, directing or authorizing the Housing and Home Finance Administrator to perform similar functions necessary in the administration of the Federal loan program under that title.

Section 3. Debt retirement assistance: This section would establish a program of Federal payments to assist educational institutions in retiring long-term bonds (that is, assist in repaying the principle and interest on such bonds) issued by them to finance the construction of housing, academic, or other educational facilities. Because of the special national interest in increasing the enrollment capacity of institutions of higher education and in improving and expanding teaching and research in the sciences or engineering at such institutions, the program is limited to facilities which will serve these national objectives. Through such assistance, institutions which must borrow on a long-term basis in order to finance their construction needs, will be encouraged and helped to do so.

Subsection (a) would authorize the Commissioner of Education prior to June 30, 1964, to make commitments to educational institutions to pay one-fourth of the principal of any amounts borrowed by them (other than amounts borrowed from the United States) to finance housing, academic, or related educational facilities.

The loans with respect to which Federal commitments may be made, must be repayable in not less than 20 or more than 50 years, and the installments of principal and interest which come due in the first 20 years of repayment must be substantially equal. Federal payments would be made in 20 equal installments, but if during the 20-year period covered by these installments the institution becomes able to and does accelerate repayment of the loan by paying more than it is required to pay in any year, future Federal installment payments would be discontinued if the Commisisoner finds that such acceleration would defeat the purposes of this program; he would so find if the acceleration indicated that the institution could have financed some of the construction through cash or short-term loans in the first instance, or if the funds available to the institution for acceleration should have been used by the institution to finance its other construction needs. These requirements and the requirements at section 3(b)(3) are designed to limit the program to institutions which, in order to construct the facilities they need, must borrow on terms involving low annual debt service charges.

There would be a ceiling of $500 million on the aggregate Federal payments which may be made under the program, and a ceiling of $5 million on payments to any one institution; these ceilings would permit Federal assistance in the financing of $2 billion worth of new construction over the 5-year period of the program, and assistance in the financing of $20 million of construction in the case of any one institution. In addition, the bill authorizes the establishment, in acts appropriating funds for the program for any fiscal year, of a ceiling upon the amount of new commitments which may be undertaken in each year.

Subsection (b) limits the Federal assistance to construction which will substantially increase (or prevent a substantial decrease in) the student enrollment capacity of the institution. However, in view of the national interest in the improvement, as well as the expansion, of science and engineering teaching and research in institutions of higher education, the Federal payments will be available for construction of facilities for these purposes, whether or not a substantial increase in enrollment capacity will result.

This subsection would also limit the Federal payments to institutions which certify that they do not have cash or other resources which they could use to finance all or any portion of the construction in lieu of borrowing on a long-term, level debt service, basis.

Section 4. Definitions: With the exceptions noted below, these definitions are the same as the definitions of similar terms in the college housing title (title IV) of the Housing Act of 1950, with the result that the draft bill would apply (with these exceptions) to the same types of institutions, the same types of facilities, and the same types of construction costs, as those covered by the existing college housing program.

The first exception is in clause (1) of subsection (b), which defines "educational institution" to mean a public or nonprofit institution which admits as regular students only persons who have graduated from high school or had an equivalent education, and which offers courses of instruction of at least 2 years' duration. The corresponding clause under the college housing programs is more restrictive, requiring that the institution offer courses of instruction which are creditable toward a baccalaureate degree. The broader definition in the draft bill will permit participation in the program of certain 2-year technical institutes and similar institutions which offer only 2-year courses not creditable toward academic degrees but which are essential to the national interest in meeting the Nation's need for trained technicians. In all other respects the definition of "educational institution" is the same as that used under the college housing program.

The second exception is the addition of a new definition of "academic facilities," so as to include within the purview of the bill (in addition to the housing and certain other educational facilities covered by the existing college housing program) classrooms, laboratories, libraries, and related facilities for instruction, research, or administration of the institution's educational and research programs. Facilities such as athletic stadiums, fieldhouses, and buildings serving purposes other than instruction, research, and administration would be excluded.

Also, this section contains a new definition of the term "bonds," to include notes, interim certificates, certificates of indebtedness, debentures, and other evidences of indebtedness.

Section 5. Administration: This section authorizes the Commissioner to delegate his authority to subordinates and provides for performance of certain fiscal, engineering, and architectural services by the Housing and Home Finance Agency. In addition, this section would preclude the Commissioner from making any Debt Retirement Assistance Commitment with respect to bonds to finance the construction of any facilities except upon assurance that labor standards, relating to payment of prevailing wages and overtime pay for work in excess of 40 hours per week or 8 hours per day, would be observed in such construction. The section also authorizes appropriations to carry out the bill.

AVAILABILITY OF SURPLUS PROPERTY TO STATE AND COUNTY EXTENSION SERVICES

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to authorize the Cooperative Extension Service to receive surplus Federal property. The State and county extension services are actually a basic part of our agricultural program. They are financed jointly by the Federal Government on a 50–50 basis with State and local governments.

Present law does not permit the State and county extension services to receive surplus Government property directly. Under certain circumstances, they can obtain a limited amount of surplus property, provided they can meet qualifications established by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, and provided property is still available after normal distribution. In many States this procedure has been inadequate. It is my understanding that existing procedures, and rightly so, require that excess property be first offered to Federal agencies. After a list has been circulated among Federal agencies, remaining surplus property is then offered to educational, public health, and civil defense agencies at State level. If it cannot be utilized by these agencies, it is then cataloged and offered at public sale, bringing a price which is usually a fraction of the purchasing cost.

The bill which I have introduced would place the Cooperative Extension Service on the same basis as HEW, Civil Defense, and other agencies now receiving surplus property. The Secretary of Agriculture would be required to issue regulations and determine the type of property which would be usable and necessary for extension work, and such property would be allocated on the basis of need. Under this procedure, the State and county extension services would request, through the authorized State agency, office equipment and other items needed for carrying out their educational programs.

The major items which are needed and which would be made available under this bill would include office equipment, such as desks, chairs, tables, file cabinets, duplicating machines, adding machines, and so forth; demonstration materials, such as photograph equipment; and teaching aids and other surplus items adaptable to extension work.

Mr. President, this bill would provide a means whereby the cooperating States could carry out work authorized by the Congress, utilizing facilities of General Services Administration in meeting a part of their property needs. It would make possible the obtaining of property which has become surplus to the needs of other Federal agencies.

Extending this authority to other than Federal agencies is not setting a new precedent. State foresters, employed in cooperation with the Forest Service of the Department of Agriculture, are permitted to utilize GSA facilities in conducting cooperative work. Likewise, agreements have been made for soil-conservation districts, working with the Soil Conservation Service of the Department, to obtain and procure needs through GSA. The effect of this bill would be to extend to the Extension Service somewhat the same authority that will enable this important educational agency to obtain surplus property which they critically need and at a possible saving to the Federal Government.

This bill is also designed to solve another pressing problem confronting the Extension Service. At the present time, county extension services occupy Federal space controlled by the Post Office Department or General Services Administration in over 500 county locations. The furnishings included in these offices consist of desks, chairs, tables, and supply and file cabinets owned by the Post Office Department or GSA. It is my understanding that a move is under way to have this property returned to the Post Office Department or GSA. If this policy is adopted, the Extension Service would then be forced to purchase replacement property. To correct this situation, my bill would authorize the Post Office Department and General Services Administration to transfer this property to State or county extension services without cost.

Mr. President, our State and county extension service program is an outstanding example of Federal and State cooperation. This agency is making a lasting contribution to agriculture. They can utilize to a great advantage surplus office equipment and other property, and they should be authorized to receive surplus items which they critically need. The bill which I have introduced provides a sound approach for making the best possible use of surplus property, and I hope that our Agriculture Committee will give full consideration to this bill at the earliest possible date.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1018) to authorize the donation of surplus property to certain agencies engaged in cooperative agricultural extension work, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. STENNIS, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Government Operations.

LOANS FOR FUR FARMERS

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, on my own behalf, and for Senators YOUNG of Ohio, MOSS, HUMPHREY, MAGNUSON, WILEY, MCCARTHY, JAVITS, NEUBERGER, and HART, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to extend the Farmers Home Administration operating loan program to bona fide fur farmers.

I have a brief statement describing this bill for which I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 1019) to extend the Farmers Home Administration operating loan program to bona fide fur farmers, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. PROXMIRE (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The statement presented by Mr. PROXMIRE is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR PROXMIRE

This bill would extend the same privileges to fur farmers as are enjoyed at present by other family-sized farm operators in respect to operating loans from the Farmers Home Administration. At present, fur farm operators are denied access to this type of farm credit.

The bill would amend section 21(a) of the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act, as amended, to include fur farmers. It would authorize loans to family-sized fur farmers such as are now available to other farmers for the purpose of purchasing livestock, seed, feed, fertilizer, equipment, supplies, and other farm needs, to reorganize the farming operations to permit more diversified or more profitable operations, to refinance existing indebtedness, and for family subsistence.

Loans would be at an interest rate of 5 percent, for a period of 7 years from the date of the initial loan. A maximum of indebtedness of $10,000 per farm operator would be permitted, except that 10 percent of the total funds available for such loans could be used for larger total amounts up to $20,000.

Fur production is an important agricultural enterprise in several States. Mink are the major fur crop at present.

Following is a list of the 12 top mink-producing States, with the number of kits produced in each in 1957:

Wisconsin	1,580,000
Minnesota	372,000
Michigan	270,000
Utah	245,000
Oregon	237,000
Illinois	235,000
Washington	228,000
New York	199,000
Iowa	161,000
Pennsylvania	156,000
Ohio	131,000
Massachusetts	130,000

The National Board of Fur Farm Organizations, at its annual meeting in Boston, Mass., August 20–22, 1958, endorsed this bill. Following are the comments published in its proceedings on the matter of farm loans for fur producers:

FEDERAL LOANS FOR FARMERS

The U.S. Department of Agriculture in its administration of a farm loan law has excluded fur farmers from the classification of family-type farms. During the 2d session of the 85th Congress certain Senators requested an opinion from the national board as to whether or not, in the interests of its members, it was desirable to amend the Federal farm loan law to specifically provide that fur farmers fall within the definition of a family-type farm.

This question was discussed by the executive committee at which time it was determined the subject would be presented for action to the directors at the 15th annual meeting of this association.

After lengthy discussion and after all aspects of the question had been explored the board of directors passed a resolution which reads as follows:

"Be it resolved, That the executive committee of the National Board of Fur Farm Organizations, Inc., seek proper legislation or Federal regulation which will permit fur farmers to qualify for loans under the Farm Home Loan Administration."

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL COAL MINE SAFETY ACT—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF BILL

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the name of the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] may be added as an additional cosponsor of the bill (S. 743) to amend the Federal Coal Mine Safety Act in order to remove the exemption with respect to certain mines employing no more than 14 individuals, introduced by me on January 28, 1959, the next time the bill is printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EFFECT OF WITHDRAWALS OR RESERVATION OF PUBLIC LANDS ON CERTAIN WATER RIGHTS—ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF BILL

Under authority of the order of the Senate of February 2, 1959, the names of Senators Moss, CHAVEZ, HRUSKA, CANNON, YOUNG of North Dakota, BARTLETT, and CASE of South Dakota were added as additional cosponsors of the bill (S. 851) to provide that withdrawals or reservation of public lands shall not affect certain water rights, introduced by Mr. O'MAHONEY (for himself and other Senators) on February 2, 1959.

COMMISSION ON EQUAL JOB OPPORTUNITY UNDER GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS—ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF BILL

Under authority of the order of the Senate of February 5, 1959, the names of Senators JAVITS, CAPEHART, SCOTT, KEATING, CURTIS, and ALLOTT were added as additional cosponsors of the bill (S. 942) to establish a Commission on Equal Job Opportunity Under Government Contracts, introduced by Mr. GOLDWATER (for himself and Mr. CASE of New Jersey) on February 5, 1959.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. President, on January 8 the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER] and I introduced Senate bill 147, a bill having to do with the modification and reauthorization of the Garrison diversion irrigation project. The bill was referred to the Committee on Public Works. In checking, I find it really belongs to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, since it is wholly a reclamation project.

I have discussed this matter with the distinguished senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ] and the distinguished senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR], who is chairman of the subcommittee handling this type of legislation. They agree it should be rereferred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill be so referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDRESSES, EDITORIALS, ARTICLES, ETC., PRINTED IN THE RECORD

On request, and by unanimous consent, addresses, editorials, articles, etc., were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. MORSE:

Statement entitled "Youth Conservation Act of 1959," prepared by him, together with editorial "A New CCC?" published in the Medford (Oreg.) Mail Tribune of January 14, 1959.

By Mr. MANSFIELD:

Article entitled "Interview With Senator GREEN—An Elder Statesman at 91 Looks at the World Today," published in the February 13, 1959, issue of U.S. News & World Report.

NOTICE OF HEARING ON NOMINATION OF FRANKLIN D. MURPHY TO BE A MEMBER OF ADVISORY COMMISSION ON EDUCATIONAL EXCHANGE

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I desire to announce that the Senate received today from the President of the United States the nomination of Franklin D. Murphy, of Kansas, to be a member of the U.S. Advisory Commission on Educational Exchange for a term of 3 years expiring January 27, 1962, and until his successor has been appointed and qualified.

Notice is given that the Committee on Foreign Relations, at the expiration of 6 days, in accordance with the committee rule, will give consideration to this nomination.

U.S. GOVERNMENT PROCUREMENT POLICY ON ELECTRICAL GENERATING AND DISTRIBUTION EQUIPMENT

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, one of the very serious problems confronting our country today is the matter of America's maintenance of her own market within this country. This morning we discussed the subject in part in the Judiciary Committee. Today, many of the imports are having a serious impact upon our economy. This matter requires study.

I hold in my hand a manuscript, prepared by the Allis-Chalmers Co., in which that company states that from the standpoint of national defense, it is most important that hydraulic turbines, hydraulic turbine generators, large transformers, and large circuit breakers which are used in our country be built in the United States.

Recently, while I was in Wisconsin, the TVA awarded a contract to a Swiss concern which had underbid the Allis-Chalmers Co. by a little more than $1 million. That meant 400,000 man-hours of unemployment in our country.

I am submitting, for printing in the RECORD, certain material which was forwarded to me. Certainly we must now give consideration to the tremendous impact of foreign cheap labor and the crisis resulting from the use of foreign products such as I have mentioned. We are informed that from the standpoint of defense it is necessary that American-produced turbines, circuit breakers, transformers, and so forth, be used at such installations in our country.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the memorandum to which I have called attention be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ELECTRICAL GENERATING AND DISTRIBUTION EQUIPMENT U.S. GOVERNMENT PROCUREMENT POLICY

I—The issue

The issue between NEMA and the Government is the adverse effect on U.S. national security of Federal procurement policy.

The issue is limited to only 4 classes of equipment of over 80 apparatus classes in the electrical industry. These are:

1. Hydraulic turbines.
2. Hydraulic turbine generators.
3. Transformers, 10,000 kilovolt-amperes and above.
4. Circuit breakers, 1,000 megavolt-amperes interrupting capacity and above.

Especially significant is whether the loss of new business to foreign bidders threatens to impair the ability of domestic suppliers of hydraulic turbines and hydraulic turbine generators to make new units or repair existing units in event of emergency. Sixty percent of the hydraulic turbines and generators installed in the United States are bought by the Federal Government. If foreign suppliers take over this part of the market, it may not be practicable for American producers to remain in this business.

II—The legal bases of the petitions

The authority of the Director of Civil Defense and Defense Mobilization to decide the issue is definite. The legal bases for his authority are:

1. Section 3(d) of Executive Order 10582, relating to the Buy American Act—to direct procurement agencies concerning circumstances in which they should reject foreign offers because it is necessary to protect essential national security interests.

2. National plan for civil defense and defense mobilization of October 1958 requiring agencies of the Federal Government to plan, prepare, and undertake actions for the execution of that plan under the Director, Office of Civil Defense Mobilization.

3. Section 8 of the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1958 requiring Director, Office of Civil Defense Mobilization, to determine effects on national security of imports of items as petitioned, or on his own motion, and take necessary action.

Executive Order 10582 and the Trade Agreements Extension Act were designed to promote foreign trade. Section 3(d) of the former and section 8 of the latter were included by Congress and the President despite arguments that they would adversely affect trade relations and political friendship with foreign countries. These are the principal arguments of foreign suppliers.

III—The petitioners

Three petitions now pending before the Director, Office of Civil Defense Mobilization, were presented by—

1. General Electric Co., of March 7, 1958.
2. Transformer section, NEMA, of March 13, 1958.
3. National Security Committee, NEMA, of May 1958.

A statement in support of the NEMA petitions was made by Westinghouse in September 1958.

IV—Arguments of the petitioners

The arguments are wholly concerned with national security. They do not include any economic issues. They are basically concerned with—

1. The fact that a continuous and uninterrupted power supply is essential to national security.

2. The fact that power centers have been recognized as prime targets for sabotage or attack since the Second World War.

3. The growing concentration in key U.S. power systems of heavy electric power equipment produced overseas.

4. The absence of adequate policy guidance in procurement of foreign equipment in respect to national security.

5. The effect of delay or disruption in deliveries of foreign equipment on the supply of electric energy.

6. The fact that rapid restoration of power service in the event of multiple outages is more feasible if equipment is of domestic origin.

These arguments are supported by detailed case histories.

V—Arguments of foreign suppliers

Their arguments are largely economic and political. The few arguments specific to the issue can be demonstrated to be irrelevant.

VI—Precedents

Precedents exist for favorable action on these petitions. They are:

1. Agreement by the Director, OCDM in March 1957 to review the issue for hydraulic turbines by individual case.

The first two cases the Director, OCDM, decided were awarded to American bidders.

2. The Central Electric Authority of Great Britain has stated that for procurement of heavy power generating and distribution equipment "it would be unwise * * * to be dependent upon foreign manufacturers for spares and maintenance."

3. The Berry amendment to the Defense Appropriations Act generally limits Defense Department procurement to textiles and foods to those produced in the United States.

4. In March 1958 the President limited purchase of crude petroleum and petroleum products for reasons of national security to those produced in the United States, unless imported products comply with the voluntary oil import program.

HEAVY ELECTRICAL MACHINERY BIDS LOST TO FOREIGN FIRMS BY U.S. FIRMS

Transformers 10,001 kv.-a. and up, 1952–58

89 contracts lost covering 279 transformers of various ratings for which U.S. bids were	$50,256,373
A–C had low U.S. bid on 5 contracts covering 12 transformers in amount of	2,932,037
Foreign firms bids awarded totaled	1,858,655

Federal Government awards in dollars for transformers in recent years to foreign firms by amount and percentage of foreign awards to total awards:

Year	Amount	Percent
1952	$1,956,650	27
1953	4,043,240	50
1954	1,211,523	40
1955	5,666,651	60
1956	3,269,393	81
1957	1,763,868	46

In the period 1956–58, U.S. firms lost 33 contracts for 136 transformers of various ratings. The U.S. bids for these units totaled $17,625,225. The foreign bids amounted to $15,053,231.

HYDRAULIC TURBINE-DRIVEN GENERATORS OF VARIOUS SIZES 1951–58

Eight contracts covering 16 units lost to United States.

U.S. bids amounted to	$12,806,651
Foreign bids awarded were	9,927,339
A–C lost 1 contract for 3 units, being low U.S. bidder at	4,290,180
Brown-Boveri won with bid of	2,639,000

TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY, WILSON DAM HYDRAULIC TURBINE GENERATORS, WAIVER OF REQUIREMENTS FOR FOREIGN BIDDERS

The bid invitation includes TVA Form 9699 (foreign bidder questionnaire) which states: "If award is made to a bidder whose manufacturing facilities are located outside the United States, general conditions, domestic materials, nondiscrimination (TVA Form 9660), and Walsh-Healey Act (TVA Form 1847A) do not apply."

The domestic materials provision is based on the Buy American Act. Generally it requires American bidders to supply items manufactured only in the United States.

The nondiscrimination provision is based on Executive Order 10557. It requires a contractor not to discriminate against any employee because of race, religion, color, or national origin.

The Walsh-Healey Act authorizes the Secretary of Labor to regulate hours, wages, and working conditions of employees working on Government contracts in excess of $10,000. Its minimum wage provision is not applicable because no minimum wage determination has been made for the electrical equipment manufacturing industry; however, the Fair Labor Standards Act does have a minimum wage provision applying to electrical equipment manufacturers.

The Walsh-Healey Act also requires work in excess of 8 hours per day or 40 hours per week to be paid at time and one-half.

The act prohibits manufacturers from employing child labor, and operating under conditions which are unsanitary, hazardous, or dangerous to health as defined by the inspection laws of the State.

We are also subject to Wisconsin's minimum wage law which applies only to women and minors. As in the case of the Fair Labor Standards Act, the minimum is well below that actually paid.

PUBLIC REACTION TO ALLIS-CHALMERS' POSITION ON TVA AWARD OF GENERATORS FOR WILSON DAM TO A FOREIGN SUPPLIER

Positive

Reaction to Allis-Chalmers' stand was swift and generally positive. Within 24 hours, union locals at the West Allis Works sent telegrams to Wisconsin Congressmen urging them to demand a review of the award by TVA and a congressional investigation of the TVA action. A number of businessmen wrote the company, citing their problems with foreign competition and praising Allis-Chalmers for its stand. Editorials appeared in many newspapers around the country, criticizing the TVA action. Said the Milwaukee Sentinel: "It's time for the Tennessee Valley Authority, a Government agency, to live by the Government's set of standards." The Knoxville Journal said: "* * * does it make sense for U.S. workers to be without jobs and manufacturers to lose business such as this because U.S. workers get more pay and the U.S. Government demands taxes of our own citizens which it cannot collect from the foreigner?" A news release was sent to U.S. Senators and Representatives and a number of them promised to look closely at the problem and perhaps introduce corrective legislation. Wisconsin's congressional delegation asked TVA for an explanation and fullest consideration of the Allis-Chalmers bid. The news release also went to utilities across the Nation. Several of them gave the full release to local papers and more editorials supporting our position resulted. A utilities' advertising association prepared a news release from our release for us in whatever way members wished. Chambers of commerce in plant cities sent protests to Members of Congress. A Milwaukee electrical engineering firm telegraphed Wisconsin Congressmen protesting the award and reproduced the wire in an ad in Milwaukee papers.

Negative

There were exceptions to the Allis-Chalmers position, such as editorials which supported TVA for buying generators at lowest cost and in support of world trade. From the Milwaukee Journal: "If American industry wants to compete abroad, and get fair treatment as against domestic competition there, can it justly demand privilege treatment * * * over foreign competition in the United States?" The Journal cited our 1957 annual report which reported increased export trade sales and noted that the United States is committed to a policy of broadened world trade. The Chattanooga Times said: "TVA was right and should be supported in its decision to buy * * * from a Swiss firm at a substantially lower price than the competitive bid from an American firm." The Danville (Va.) Register: "The TVA directors would have had a come uppance coming had they squandered $4.29 million for generators they can purchase for $2.5 million and probably help international trade in so doing." Of letters to the editor in various newspapers, only a few were negative to our position, all of them taking the line that other nations must sell to the United States in order to buy from us.

ICE AGE PARK AND TRAIL FOUNDATION OF WISCONSIN, INC.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, recently I introduced a bill to establish, in Wisconsin, an Ice Age National Park, to preserve significant areas of moraines formed by glacial action thousands of years ago.

The Wisconsin moraines—about a 500-mile-long area, including formations of rock, hills, valleys, and rocks of scientific and geological significance—represent the most unique of the glacial-sculptured topographical features in the country.

It will be recalled that, upon introduction of the bill, I commented on the work of a number of conservation-minded enthusiasts who are supporting this program.

I am pleased to report that one of the major enthusiasts for this Ice Age Park, Mr. Raymond T. Zillmer, of Milwaukee, has organized a foundation to assist the local, State, and Federal Governments in its work for preserving the Wisconsin moraines. As it meets its stated objectives, this foundation, I believe, will perform a real public service.

I am happy to report, also, that the project has the enthusiastic support of veterans, civic, and other organizations in Wisconsin. As an illustration, recently I received a resolution, adopted by the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, Department of Wisconsin, in support of this project.

I ask unanimous consent that a brief statement on the purposes of this foundation and the resolution adopted by the Wisconsin VFW be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement and resolution were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ICE AGE PARK AND TRAIL FOUNDATION OF WISCONSIN, INC.

Nowhere in the United States are there available for public use glacial remains of the ice age equal in variety and beauty to those in Wisconsin.

PURPOSE OF FOUNDATION

1. The foundation will assist the Federal, State, and local governments in establishing and preserving a public park for future generations in the glacial formations of Wisconsin, 500 miles across the entire State.

2. It will assist in establishing in this park a parkway drive following a curved line and the natural contours wherever possible, together with picnic-spot waysides on the parkway for public use.

3. It will assist in establishing a trail for hikers and skiers with shelters in the nature of the Appalachian and John Muir Trails.

4. It will foster the education of the people, especially the young people, in the beauties and wonders of nature and its spiritual and healthgiving values so that they will make greater use of such areas, as well as other outdoor areas, with a view to developing men and women who are strong and healthy—physically, mentally, and spiritually.

The last is the most important purpose and is a long-range objective of 1, 2, and 3, as a constructive solution of the juvenile problem.

* * * * *

THE USE OF PROCEEDS

The money will be used, after expenses of administration, to promote the above purposes of the foundation, by giving land or money to the governmental unit establishing the park. If anyone is interested in developing a particular area, the funds will be used as indicated. However, conferences should precede any specific allocation so that it may fit into the general plan of the foundation. Direct gifts to the governmental units involved may be made, but these should not be made until after conferences to ascertain suitability for the general purpose and plan of the foundation, and then only through the foundation which will supervise the gift to see that the donors' wishes are carried out. Funds for specific units or purposes will be set aside in separate special accounts, or in trust accounts if desired.

RESOLUTION No. 7

Resolution supporting establishment of Wisconsin Moraine National Park

Whereas a bill has been introduced in the 86th Congress of the United States calling for the creation of a national park in Wisconsin from the meandering glacial moraines located in some 26 counties of the State, the nucleus of this area being the Kettle Moraine State Park; and

Whereas the last of the four great glaciers was called the Wisconsin Glacier because in no other place in America did the glacier leave clearer evidence of its existence; and

Whereas this natural feature of our State should be perpetuated in the form of a national park; and

Whereas Wisconsin does not have a national park; and

Whereas this moraine area has no economic value because of the very thin topsoil and underlying gravel, but is ideal for recreational purposes, such as skiing, hiking, camping, etc.; and

Whereas as this proposed park, 500 miles long, about one-fourth mile wide, and totaling 125 square miles or 70,000 acres, will enhance the recreational scenic and business aspects of the State; and

Whereas it is well established that recreation areas must be set aside now to take care of the needs of our increasing population: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Council of Administration, Department of Wisconsin, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, duly convened at its midwinter conference at Sheboygan, on January 23, 24, and 25, 1959, That we go on record to enthusiastically support the Wisconsin Moraine National Park proposal, that we urge all posts and auxiliaries to write to their respective Representatives in Congress expressing support of such a national park in Wisconsin, and that a copy of this resolution be sent to Senators ALEXANDER WILEY and WILLIAM PROXMIRE, and to all Wisconsin Congressmen.

WHY MORE DELAY IN LIMITING PETROLEUM IMPORTS

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at this time I may proceed for not more than 4 minutes to make a brief statement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Kansas may proceed.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, for several months, a Special Cabinet Committee has been studying the oil-import problem. The President on December 22, 1958, announced that a decision by the committee has been delayed, and that the present, ineffective voluntary effort to restrict oil imports is to be continued to March 1, 1959. This delay in reaching a firm and effective solution to the oil-import problem is alarming.

While these studies and discussions continue, oil imports increase.

More than three years ago the Congress became concerned about the oil-import problem and the damaging effect foreign oil was having on the domestic industry. In 1955 the Congress passed the defense amendment, giving the President authority to limit imports in the interest of national security. At that time the Congress was alarmed at the injurious effects being caused by oil imports of 1 million barrels daily. Now, more than 3 years later, after taking action which we had every reason to believe was fully adequate to take care of this problem, oil imports during recent weeks have been averaging nearly 2 million barrels daily.

Last year, when Congress approved the extension of the trade law, it was agreed by the executive branch, the Congress, and the domestic petroleum industry, that imports of foreign oil must be held at a reasonable level. To remove any doubt as to the adequacy of the President's authority to limit oil imports, Congress strengthened the defense amendment as a part of the new trade law. Now, after 6 months, we still do not have any implementation of the new law. For that matter, no real and effective action has been taken to limit total oil imports since the defense amendment was adopted in 1955. True enough, under the voluntary program inaugurated in 1957, imports of crude oil have been somewhat reduced. But there has been no attempt to restrict imports of oil products. As a result, product imports have run amuck, now averaging nearly 800,000 barrels daily, which is 50 percent above the level at this time last year. Every barrel of petroleum product displaces 1½ to 2 barrels of domestic crude production, and thus the large product increases have more than offset any limitations on crude oil imports.

It is damaging to permit a domestic industry which is so closely tied to our national defense as the petroleum industry to grow weaker and weaker as a result of increasing imports. Growth of this industry for future peacetime and emergency needs has been stagnated. Since 1956 we have seen drilling decline 15 percent, geophysical and core drilling crews down 18 percent, and wildcat or exploratory wells down 26 percent. While the domestic industry retrenches, imports increase year after year.

As a matter of national policy, the President's Cabinet Committee declared in July 1957 that "If we are to have enough oil to meet our national security needs there must be a limitation on imports that will insure a proper balance between imports and domestic production." Yet we are now confronted with more delay in bringing about an effective program that will establish a proper balance between imports and the domestic industry, and thereby alleviate the deterioration being suffered by the domestic industry. It is frightening to contemplate that as foreign oil imports continue to increase and take a larger and larger share of the domestic market, the availability of these imports is becoming less and less stable. What has taken place recently in Venezuela, coupled with the Suez and Middle East crises, should convince even the most ardent advocate of foreign oil that as a Nation we cannot afford to become dependent upon these sources.

I urgently and respectfully implore the President and his Cabinet Committee to reconsider their recent action and immediately implement the defense amendment with a workable and effective program to limit imports of foreign oil.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the distinguished Senator from Kansas may have 1 additional minute, so that I may make a comment on his statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Kansas may proceed for an additional minute.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I yield to the distinguished minority leader.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am delighted to commend the interest of my distinguished colleague from Kansas in this matter. A good deal of testimony on this and related items was brought out as a result of the Suez controversy several years ago. At that time we went into the international import picture, which brought into focus the whole import program. Before too long, as a result of the interest of President Eisenhower and the administration, there was established the Cabinet Committee, and voluntary quotas were put into effect. I have kept up with the problem. I know of the abiding interest of the President in it, and that of a good many others. Our colleague, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON], has also been interested in the problem. I hope we can follow through on the matter, find out precisely what the situation is since we have been under the voluntary quota system, and ascertain what is necessary in order to arrive at a workable, feasible, effective solution of the problem, so that our independent producers can look with some degree of assurance to relief from their problem. Goodness knows how many there are; at least 1,500 belong to the association. I commend the distinguished Senator from Kansas for his vigilant interest.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I appreciate the remarks of the distinguished minority leader. He has put his finger on a very important situation. Seemingly, from the viewpoint of the independent oil operator, it looks as if there has been an extremely longer delay than should have taken place in working toward a solution. We hope that as a result of the work of the Cabinet Committee and related agencies that are responsible for working on the problem we can find that something constructive can be done, because the industry is getting into a bad state of affairs. I am very appreciative of what the distinguished Senator from Illinois has just said.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, I should like to concur in the remarks made in the colloquy between the distinguished minority leader and my colleague from Kansas in regard to the need for getting early action on what should be a program of the Federal Government and our Nation with respect to oil imports. I cannot stress too seriously how the problem affects our individual States, oil operators, and our national defense as a whole. Therefore, I appreciate the statement made by the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL].

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, I desire to commend the distinguished senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL] on his remarks this morning with reference to the flood of foreign imports which are doing so much to depress the petroleum industry in the United States. I associate myself with the remarks which the distinguished Senator from Kansas has made. I think it very timely that he called to the attention of this body the serious national problem involved.

TENTH INTERNATIONAL PANCAKE DAY RACE AT LIBERAL, KANS.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, our Nation is always interested in programs that promote world friendship and good will among the peoples of the earth.

Tomorrow in Liberal, Kans., the 10th annual International Pancake Day race will be run. This race is sponsored by the junior chamber of commerce of Liberal, Kans., for the promotion of international relations between England and the United States.

The race has an interesting historical background and is based on competition between the young ladies of Olney, England, and Liberal, Kans. The background, historically, is this:

In old England, it was customary for the housewives to drop whatever they were doing and hurry to the church at the tolling of the bell to be shriven of their sins. In 1445, a wife in Olney, England, started baking her pancakes, and they were not quite done when the church bell rang, but she hurried off to the church, carrying her griddle and pancakes with her. Thus an annual sporting event was born.

In Liberal the housewives heard of the 500-year event of pancake racing over a 415-yard course from the town pump to the church, and in 1950 a challenge from them for a contest was accepted by Rev. R. C. Collins, vicar of Olney. In the running of the International Pancake Day race over identical courses, times of the winners in both Liberal and Olney are compared by trans-Atlantic telephone.

The junior chamber of commerce and citizens of Liberal are to be commended for arranging a program and providing for the competition, which will bring about increased good will and relations between our Nation and England.

Mr. President, as one who has attended these pancake day races, I can assure my colleagues of the great interest in it. Girls or ladies in the United States have won in about 50 percent of the contests.

KANSAS STATE FARM BUREAU VIEWS ON AIRPORT CONSTRUCTION AND FEDERAL HOUSING LEGISLATION

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, the Kansas State Farm Bureau wrote me expressing their views on Senate 1, a bill providing Federal aid for airport construction and the recently approved Federal housing legislation.

I did not have the letter, which was signed by W. I. Boone, president, when these bills were before the Senate, and therefore I ask unanimous consent that extracts from the letter be made a part of my remarks today.

The letter states that the Kansas Farm Bureau recognizes the need for extending airport runways to accommodate faster planes and facilities to improve operational safety, but they firmly believe that the Federal Government should not be a contributing party to the rivalry between cities in the construction of impressive terminal buildings.

The Kansas Farm Bureau Federation also express their views concerning a balanced budget, and urge Congress to take no steps that will further increase the inflationary pressures.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request to have extracts from the letter printed?

There being no objection, the extracts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We are deeply concerned with the apparent haste in the Senate to push through with limited hearings the aid to airport construction and the greatly expanded Federal housing programs.

In our judgment the announced intention by committee chairmen to press for quick enactment of S. 1 contains the threat of establishing early in this Congress a spending pattern which makes even a near balanced budget or any brake on inflationary forces a nebulous dream of the distant future.

We can understand why cities feel that all taxpayers through the Federal Government should participate in the cost of such programs. We recognize the need for extending airport runways to accommodate faster planes and facilities to improve operational safety. We believe, however, the responsibility of the Federal Government should be limited primarily to these expenditures on a matching basis.

We do not believe the Federal Government should be a contributing party to the rivalry between cities in the construction of impressive terminal buildings. Collection of appropriate user charges would further reduce need for appropriated funds.

Continued inflation threatens the destruction of the whole economic and political structure. But of immediate concern is the cost-price squeeze on farmers. With little prospect of quick improvement in agricultural prices to further raise agricultural costs through inflation only makes the squeeze more critical.

BENSON-ADMINISTRATION FARM PROPOSAL WOULD FORCE MORE FARMERS OFF THEIR FARMS

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, the approach of Secretary of Agriculture Ezra Benson and the administration to the national farm problem has moved from the incredible to the ridiculous.

It was incredible that this antifarmer administration should seek to solve the agriculture surplus problem by cutting price supports. This move simply forced every dirt farmer to try to produce more in order to earn enough income on which to live. As our farmers sought to keep above water in the face of depressed prices and higher costs of living, our Nation's agricultural surpluses mounted to record highs.

During this period, the farmers—particularly the small family farmer—got poorer, and those folks sometimes characterized as the "ones who farm the farmers" got more and more of the food dollar. The farmer now receives only 40 cents of the food dollar.

But the administration's Bensonism does not change easily. Now the administration has come up with a ridiculous new farm proposal aimed at further cutting price supports. The new Benson plan would abandon the parity concept for farm prices and figure supports on the basis of open market prices. Department of Agriculture figures show that this open market formula could result in a drop of as much as 38 cents a bushel in wheat price supports and as much as 61 cents a hundred pounds in milk price supports.

Mr. President, this morning I was talking with woolgrowers from my home State, who are now receiving 40 cents a pound for wool. In 1936, at the bottom of the depression, these woolgrowers were receiving 42 cents a pound for wool. The price is now less than it was at the bottom of the depression, but in the meantime the prices these woolgrowers have to pay have risen to sometimes 3 times as high as they were in 1936, and in other cases they are 10 times as high as they were 1936.

Mr. President, adoption of the Bensonism proposal would be compounding the farm tragedy. It would mean that many hundreds of thousands more little farmers would be driven off their land. It would mean more depressed areas, more pockets of poverty across the Nation.

In his message to the Congress, President Eisenhower recounted the vast expenditures under the agriculture program and told us the program is not working. Surely all of us agree that under Bensonism this program has grown progressively worse. But I resent the implication that through price supports farmers are getting an unfair advantage. Over the past 50 years, for every $1,000 this country has spent for subsidies the American farmer has received only $5. Governmental aid also goes to airlines, petroleum interests, shipping, and many other industries. Why, then, should the administration single out farm expenditures as a great loss and suggest that we continue down the same trail of depressed farm prices, greater stacks of surpluses, and, most important, greater hardship for a majority of the farm people of America?

Regardless of the administration's proposal, it is mandatory that we turn our back on this proposed road to financial ruin for more farmers. Instead we must have the vision, courage, intelligence and determination to initiate a bold new approach to the problems besetting the agriculture industry. The farmer is not to blame for his present plight.

Last week Mr. J. L. Johns, manager of the Upshur-Rural Electric Cooperative Corp. of Gilmer, Tex., sent me an outstanding editorial on this subject. Mr. Johns, like the thousands of Rural Electrification Association leaders who are now in convention here and others across the Nation, is keenly aware of the farm problems and has worked diligently for their solution. He sent me an editorial recently published by the Tyler, Tex., Morning Telegraph and noted:

> It is the first newspaper in our area to my knowledge that had editorially presented the facts on the farm situation.

I regard this as one of the finest editorials I have ever read on the farm problem. Tyler is located in the heart of the traditional east Texas farm belt, and with the lessening of oil production there, farming is becoming more important.

Mr. President, I request unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Tyler Morning Telegraph of Monday, February 2, 1959, under the heading: "Don't Blame Farmers."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DON'T BLAME FARMERS

Sometimes the only way to get the real feel of the other fellow's side of the argument is to put the shoe on the other foot.

And it now seems about time for that shoe swap to be made, in effect, in considering the ups and downs of the farmer. The result could be to relieve the farm order of things from a lot of criticism, especially from the town folks who feel that folks in the country are having it extra easy under the Government supports program.

And that criticism often includes the feeling that the cost of grocery store food would drop to easier levels for the consumers if much of the Government money were cut off in its flow to the farmers. Besides, it is often said, the whole farm supports program is costing the taxpayers a lot of money.

All that's familiar, isn't it? And the best rebuttal comes from the Capper's Farmer magazine, which has put its defense of the farmer in pamphlet form and printed several thousand copies.

The core of the farm problem, says Capper, is this: In any normal peacetime year farmers can produce more than the market will take at prices fair to everyone concerned. The reason is that we have, through research, created a whole application of mechanical power to agriculture, created a whole new way of producing farm products. The revolution is still going on. In the past 18 years farmers have boosted their efficiency as much as in the preceding 120 years.

City workers have helped bring this increased efficiency on the farms, by providing tractors, chemicals, fertilizers, fuels, and an abundance of other facilities and services. Result: Since the early 1940's the combined per acre yield of 18 leading field crops has increased by a dramatic 40 percent. But producing food is only part of it.

The food business is a chain with farmers at one end. In between farms and shelves of supermarkets is the marketing system. The off-farm operations are handled by some 6 million persons, says Capper, who are producing for and servicing farmers and around 10 million who are distributing farm products. Adding these to around 8 million farm operators and farmhands makes about 24 million persons.

This combination of functions is called agribusiness. It's the Nation's largest business, accounting for 37 percent of the U.S. working force. In their part of it, farmers are a $14-billion-a-year customer of industry and labor—not counting the billions farm people spend for consumer goods.

Are farmers to blame for high food prices? Well, Capper says that last year some 60 cents out of every dollar we spent for food went to the people who bought, handled, sold, processed, transported, and packaged farm products. A little less than 40 cents went to farmers.

Consider also that although they make up 12 percent of the population and produce 65 percent of the raw materials for industry, farmers in 1957 got only 4 percent of the national income. And during all that time the cost of all the farmers' tools of production increased. Capper says that "cost-price squeeze" has put a lot of farmers out of business. That sad fact is stressed in these figures from the U.S. Department of Agriculture: In 1950, for example, 25,058,000 people lived on farms. That's 16.6 percent of all of us. Now, 8 years later, though population has increased, there are some 5 million fewer farmers—and they represent only 12 percent of the U.S. population.

And, Capper reminds, many of those left on the farm have to work off the farm to make ends meet. It's estimated that about a third of the farm population are doing off-the-farm work, full-time or part-time.

Capper grants you that help is given through farm subsidies, but reminds that Government aid is also given to airlines, schools, the petroleum industry, housing, shipping, and so on. It would be pretty hard, the magazine says, to name a business that is not receiving some kind of Government aid.

And we are also reminded that in the past 50 years, for every $1,000 this country has spent for subsidies, the American farmer has received only $5. That's why, we're told, farmers get awfully tired of city newspapers headlining the cost of farm subsidies.

Not all of the money in the Federal farm budget goes to the farmers. A considerable part of it goes to business for storage of products and other costs.

Farmers, as much or more than anybody else, would like to solve the problem of surpluses, but how? It would be easy to solve the problem by cutting down on production by say some 10 percent if farming were concentrated as big agriculture. But it isn't, says Capper, in calling attention to some 4½ million farmers over the Nation. The farmer is an individual in a great sea of competition. He is a price taker, not a price setter.

And Capper adds that the farmer works "with an uncontrollable business partner—nature. Sun, wind, and rains control his cash register like a fickle bookkeeper.

"No single farmer can do much about changing the supply of food, fiber, and tobacco coming to market. And collectively, farmers can't produce just exactly what our Nation demands. Agriculture is a biological process which cannot be greatly accelerated or retarded in any short time."

Working out a satisfactory farm program is no easy chore. By nature the farmer is independent, or would like to be, and that has caused some farmers and farm leaders to strike out for more freedom in agriculture, freedom from Government controls. To that end they are pressing for lower price supports and greater freedom of operation, including what has been called a free market. They want to outgrow Federal programs by gradually strengthening the farm economy.

At the same time, as Capper shows, farmers realize we live in an era characterized by the minimum wage and generally stabilized industrial prices. Farmers want to protect themselves against the increasing costs of production and distribution. They want to mobilize their strength to bargain on a more equal basis with highly organized industry and labor.

Capper has done a commendable public service in presenting a side of the agriculture picture that seldom comes to the surface. It becomes plain that the farmers' problems belong to all of us, and that the farmers would like to solve these common problems just as much as anybody else. There's no argument against the Capper magazine's claim that the important thing is to make wise decisions, now and in the future. And many people feel that before we drop everything in our farm program for something new, we should demonstrate that there is a roadback if new plans fail.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, on this subject, I also request unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article from the New York Times of Sunday, February 8, 1959, under the heading "Farm Props Slash Seen in New Plan."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas?

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FARM PROPS SLASH SEEN IN NEW PLAN—DROP IN FEDERAL SUPPORTS EXPECTED—U.S. SURPLUS SPENDING AT RECORD

WASHINGTON, February 7.—Department of Agriculture figures show that Federal farm price supports would be cut sharply under administration recommendations for major revision of farm law.

By abandoning the longtime parity concept for farm prices and changing to a formula geared to open market prices, wheat support levels could drop as much as 38 cents a bushel and milk as much as 61 cents a 100 pounds from existing Federal guarantees.

The Government also reported this week that its investment in surplus farm commodities had climbed to a peak of more than $9 billion.

The Department of Agriculture said that heavy loans made under Federal price support operations in January on cotton, wheat, corn, and other grains from the record crop production of 1958 had raised the investment to the present level.

The new peak compared with the previous record of $8,900 million reached in February 1956. The Department reports that as of December 31, the total investment in surplus products was $8,716,071,371.

NET LOSS OF $367 MILLION

It said the net realized loss on price support operations for the 6 months that ended December 31 was $367,923,679 compared with $547,857,702 in the same 6 months of 1957. The net loss for the fiscal year that ended last June 30 was $1,006,548,967.

In his special farm message to Congress last month, President Eisenhower estimated the Government's investment in surplus farm products would total $10,500 million by June 30, 1960. Other officials have estimated that the investment would climb between $10 billion and $13 billion in the next 5 years.

The Commodity Credit Corporation, the Government's price support agency, has authority to borrow up to $14,500 million for its operations. As of December 31, the CCC had in use $12,955,627,000. Actual borrowing totaled $12,153 million and obligations to purchase loans financed by private lending agencies amounted to $802,627,000, leaving a statutory borrowing authority of $1,544,373,000.

Under the administration's revision plan butter, which now is supported at 56.6 cents a pound, could fall to a Federal prop level of 44 cents a pound. Similar reductions were calculated on other crops, including cotton, rice, peanuts, and tobacco.

Senator WILLIAM PROXMIRE, Democrat of Wisconsin, called on the administration this week to produce estimates by career economists on how much farm prices would be cut through the changes proposed by President Eisenhower in his special farm message to Congress last week.

In a letter to Mr. Benson, Senator PROXMIRE said that he believed the President's proposal would result in an immediate 10- to 25-percent drop in prices received by farmers for so-called basic commodities.

The basic crops are corn, wheat, cotton, rice, peanuts, and tobacco. Price supports are mandatory for this group of crops. Other crops for which price supports at specific levels are mandatory include milk and butter, wool, honey, and tung nuts. On other crops price guarantees are permissive within the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture.

In his farm message, President Eisenhower urged Congress to scrap the 25-year-old system of price supports tied to parity, a formula aimed at assuring farmers the same purchasing power they enjoyed in a past favorable period when crop supplies and demand were regarded in favorable balance.

THREE-YEAR PERIOD SEEN

Instead of the parity formula, the President proposed substituting supports on the products for which props are mandatory geared to the average market prices during a period preceding any given crop-year. He did not suggest a period, but administration thinking has been for a 3-year term.

The President also proposed that the Secretary of Agriculture be given discretion to set supports between 75 and 90 percent of the average market prices. This range is the same as currently existing for supports under the parity concept.

The parity price of wheat as of January 15 was $2.36 a bushel. The Federal support level is 75 percent of parity. This figures out to a $1.81 a bushel national average Federal price support this year.

The Agriculture Department's figures show that the market average for the last years, 1956, 1957, and 1958 was $1.91 a bushel. If the 75 percent Federal support was applied, the market formula guarantee would be $1.43 a bushel, or 38 cents a bushel lower than guaranteed by the parity system.

Using the ceiling of 90 percent support suggested by the President, the price guarantee level for wheat on the market average system would be about $1.72 a bushel, still 11 cents a bushel below the present floor for the grain.

One of the major reasons advanced by the President for changing the Federal price support system was that the parity concept was outmoded by modern agriculture and its yielded price incentives for farmers to produce for Government storage rather than for the market.

BUDGET ESTIMATES AGAINST APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, apropos of the discussion we had on the floor a few days ago, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my brief statement this morning a summary of the President's budget estimates and the appropriations of the Congress, showing how much each of those budget estimates has been decreased by the Congress in the years the incumbent President has held that office.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I congratulate the distinguished chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, as well as the distinguished chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee [Mr. HAYDEN], who is on the floor at this time, for their record of prudent service to this Nation throughout the years. Both men are frugal men. Both men are thrifty men. Both men have required the Executive to give adequate justifications for funds appropriated.

The record shows that the Congress has reduced the budget estimate in each one of the last 6 years. The total appropriation was $22,637,703,518 less than the Congress was asked to appropriate—$22 billion less than was requested. If we average it out by years, Mr. President, there was an average reduction in the budget of more than $3,772 million a year.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a brief paragraph on new obligational authority, as published in the Washington Post and Times Herald this morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, in order to have a complete picture, I desire to point out, with regard to the budget for fiscal year 1960, that the administration estimates that there will be a balance unobligated at the end of fiscal year 1959 of some $10,314 million; money which has been appropriated and will be unobligated as of the end of fiscal 1959.

I also suggest, though I have not explored this carefully, that the Committee on Appropriations give consideration to the possibility of conducting inquiries into the unobligated balances, so that if it appears that certain rescissions be made, the committee can so recommend to the Congress.

As I have stated many times, Mr. President, I do not think that either party should be labeled as "the party of the savers," or "the party of the spenders," but the record does show that the Congress as an institution has been much more saving in its appropriations than the Executive has been in his requests for appropriations. As I have stated, the Executive requested $22 billion more than was appropriated in the last 6 years.

I am convinced each bill will be thoroughly examined with a fine tooth comb. The President's requests will be given sympathetic and sincere consideration, fair and objective consideration.

Some of the requests will be granted in toto, without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t."

Reductions in substantial amounts, no doubt, will be made in some of the requests, because, Mr. President, the Congress should know that in one bill alone the Executive this year is asking for $825 million more than the Congress appropriated for the program last year—almost a billion dollars more to go overseas than the Congress was willing to give last year.

In some cases no doubt the Congress will reduce the President's requests. We will make additions to some, as we did with respect to veterans' housing the other day, in the amount of $35 million for next year; and for the airports it may be an extra $35 million next year. There will be a few million here and a few million there. The Congress will express its judgment, because it is not a "me, too" Congress. Congress will add to some requests and in regard to others it will agree with the proposal. As to still other matters Congress will make real, substantial reductions.

I believe that before the year is over—if the people will look at the record, as Al Smith used to say, which has been made for 6 years—the people will find they can depend on the Congress to follow a course of prudent progressivism. The President can depend upon the Congress to meet him more than halfway, to cooperate with him wherever it feels he is right, and to oppose him only when it thinks he is wrong, and then to oppose him only on principle, and not on the basis of personalities.

Democrats are not taking the administration label of spenders lying down.

Chairman CLARENCE CANNON, Democrat, of Missouri, of the House Appropriations Committee prodded Maurice H. Stans, Director of the Budget, to admit that President Eisenhower actually has asked Congress for more money than it has been willing to give him.

In the 6 fiscal years 1954 through 1959, the President requested new obligational authority totaling $407,174 million, but Congress in those 6 years voted $403,270 million—or $3,904 million less than the President requested.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. For the record, I should like to know the answer to certain questions. I am seeking information, because I do not know the answers, and I am glad the chairman of the Appropriations Committee is present.

I am told that during each of the 6 years of the Eisenhower administration, during two of which the Republicans were in control of Congress, and during four of which the Democrats were in control of Congress, the Congress reduced the President's overall budget request. Is that correct?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That is correct, according to the table I have just placed in the RECORD. Let me go over the record by years. These are round figures.

For the fiscal year 1954, the reduction was $12 billion.

For the fiscal year 1955, it was $2,609,000,000.

For the fiscal year 1956, it was $2,075,000,000.

For the fiscal year 1957, the reduction was $257,000,000, the lowest figure in the series.

For the fiscal year 1958, the Congress made a reduction of $5,043,000,000. That was the year I was discussing the other day.

In the fiscal year 1959, the Congress made a reduction of $617,036,000.

The total for the 6 years amounts to $22,637,703,518 below the budget requests. That includes all supplemental bills and all other requests. It does not include appropriations for refunds of taxes, sinking fund and debt-retirement fund. They are not calculated in these totals.

I think it should be clear that there is no better way to judge the future than by the past. Congress has been very careful with the taxpayers' dollars, and will continue to be.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The matter to which the majority leader alludes was the subject of a colloquy the other day during our consideration of the housing bill. I reserved the right to obtain authority to insert in the RECORD at the appropriate time what I think is the full story, including everything related to the budget. Those items are now in preparation, and in due course—I trust probably yet this week—we shall have them in shape so that they can be submitted for the RECORD, in order that the entire fiscal picture may be brought to the attention of the country.

I concur in the observation made by the distinguished majority leader with respect to our distinguished friend from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. He is fair. He is realistic. He has excellent perspective, and he always thinks in terms of the national interest. I salute him for the great and forbearing job he has done.

When it comes to the chairman of the Appropriations Committee of another body, I cannot help but remark that the President's 1960 budget was called a propaganda budget. It was called a Republican boobytrap. The chairman of the Appropriations Committee in the other body referred to it as a spenders' budget. So evidently we are out of line; and if we go further out of line, it will be even more of a spending budget.

I have said, with respect to authorization bills, that I do not want the Congress or the country to commit fiscal suicide on the installment plan.

I never think of the fiscal situation without being reminded of a Government project out home many years ago. It was a make-work project. There was a huge hole in the street. When the work had been finished and the hole filled, there was a great mound of earth, which constituted a traffic hazard. The gentlemen wielding the shovels did not know what to do. Finally they held a conference on the curb. Someone said, I will tell you how to get rid of that mound of earth. We will just dig the hole deeper. [Laughter.]

I do not want to be digging the hole deeper, bill after bill and bill after bill. The budget which came to us was in balance, even though it was a rather thin and precarious balance. But I want to be sure that in no case do we cross the line and wind up at the end of the year with a budget out of balance.

It is interesting to note that although the Congress makes reductions in the budget, partly because of the recession in revenue and partly because of extra spending, it has been estimated that on June 30 there will be a deficit of $13 billion. I wish that term could be made more understandable and palatable. I freely admit that it is a deficit of my administration—$13 billion for 365 days. It does not make me happy.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Would the Senator be as free to admit that we appropriated less for the administration to spend than the administration asked us to appropriate?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I will admit anything that the figures finally disclose.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator is aware of the figures, is he not?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am aware of the figures.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The fact is that in the 85th Congress we appropriated almost $6 billion less than the administration asked us to appropriate. Which course is more likely to lead us into national fiscal suicide—a course in which we add $6 billion, or a course in which we reduce spending by $6 billion?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Sometimes the Appropriations Committee is bypassed. We received some testimony on that point when the Budget Director was before the committee last year. I have the hearings before me, but I prefer to place the entire picture in the RECORD in one piece when the time comes, so that the story will be complete.

I have lived here long enough to know that in a given year we have been accustomed to chop money out of an appropriation bill only to find, in January, that the agency comes forward with a supplemental request. A classic example is the money we took from the Veterans' Administration 2 years ago. In the committee I said, "We shall have to give it back. This represents a contract with the veterans. These costs are established in the law. The findings and awards have been made. Now we eliminate certain amounts from the bill. The agency will be back in January."

It was back. I know that a supplemental request can be made in the next fiscal year, but it must go into the overall budget picture. I wish to show the entire picture in the RECORD.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I point out that the material which the Senator from Texas has inserted in the RECORD includes all requests, and all supplemental requests over a long period of 6 years of the great crusade. During that 6-year period the net result was as I have stated. The Senator from Illinois does not have to give Congress credit if he does not wish to do so. Congress has trimmed the budget estimates over that period by $22,637,703,518. The facts cannot be glossed over. We cannot draw the curtain over them, or forget them, because the RECORD is before us. It includes all supplemental requests and appropriations.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I do not want to forget it. The first budget under which Dwight Eisenhower worked was not an Eisenhower budget at all. It was a Truman budget.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That is included in my figures, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. DIRKSEN. When the Truman budget came up, that was Harry's last Christmas present. It was $9 billion in the hole. I have seen 18 deficits out of 20 years when my party was not in power. I was here during all but 2 years, and on the Appropriations Committee all the time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. How many deficits has the Senator seen since his party has been in power?

Mr. DIRKSEN. There have been deficits.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. How many?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I do not exactly recall.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. There have been deficits in 4 of the 6 years. The only 2 years when there was no deficit was when there was a Democratic Congress.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The President led the way. With respect to the Truman budget, he said, "Slash it."

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Congress reduced the budget $8,609 million for the fiscal year 1953, the last year Mr. Truman was in office; and I remind the Senator that the Congress cut the next budget, for 1954, by $12 billion.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am glad it did.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. So am I.

Mr. DIRKSEN. All this ruckus arose over the budgets for the fiscal years 1958 and 1959. The statement was made that "We cut this out," and "We cut that out." It occurred to me that the $5 billion amount was applicable to 2 years instead of 1.

There was further information in the Appropriations Committee. We will get it all in shape, so that the Comptroller's office and the Bureau of the Budget will know the factors which probably would not be disclosed in the figures which come from the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I should like to remind the Senator from Illinois that the reduction for fiscal year 1958 was $5,043 million, and for fiscal year 1959 it was $617 million. I said that for the 85th Congress it was roughly $5,600 million. In other words, it was a reduction of $5 billion for the first session, and a reduction of $600 million for the next session. However, even if it were no more than $1, the point is that Congress reduced the budget estimate.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Well, Congress can reduce the budget estimate, of course, but if we still get the money out of the Treasury, the effect is just the same as if it had been $10 billion.

Mr. President, I do not wish to carry this discussion any further. I wish to get my ducks in a row. I want to gather my figures. I have not had an opportunity to do it thus far. Then my beloved friend from Texas and I will get all the facts on the line, to find out where we are. I can appreciate his feelings in the matter. He is a great citizen, and I know that he will not get very sensitive if I should become rather energetic on this subject, as I must, because I believe we are in a position where we can defend what has been done, and do it in a big, glorious way.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Both Congress and the administration can.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT ASSOCIATION

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, dated January 16, 1959. This letter contains a report of the current status of the study being made by the National Advisory Council for International Monetary and Financial Problems into the proposed International Development Association, the subject of the Monroney resolution which was adopted by the Senate in 1958.

The Banking and Currency Committee report on Senate Resolution 264 requested that an interim report on the current status of the study be made at the end of 1958, and this letter constitutes the interim report.

This report shows that the proposed International Development Association has been studied within the National Advisory Council, and has been the subject of informal discussions with the representatives of other governments, particularly at the annual meeting of the Fund and the Bank at New Delhi.

The committee is glad to have this report, brief though it is, and is glad to know that the study is proceeding. We will look for further reports as the study progresses.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, January 16, 1959.

Hon. J. W. FULBRIGHT,
Chairman, Committee on Banking and Currency, Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Pursuant to Senate Resolution 264, 85th Congress, the National Advisory Council on International Monetary and Financial Problems is currently studying the feasibility of establishing an International Development Association. The report of your committee recommending the adoption of the resolution stated that "if the study is not completed by December 31, 1958, the committee would expect to be furnished with an interim report." The purpose of this letter is to supply such an interim report.

In August 1958, an exchange of letters took place between President Eisenhower and the Secretary of the Treasury dealing with increases in the resources of the International Monetary Fund, the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, and consideration of an International Development Association. In substance, the President directed me, as U.S. Governor of the Fund and the Bank, to propose consideration of these matters at the annual meeting of the two institutions in October. Copies of these letters are attached for your information.

On October 6, 1958, in addressing the opening joint session at the annual meeting of the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank at New Delhi, in my capacity as Governor of the Fund and Bank for the United States, I included the following:

"I should also like to say something about the International Development Association to which President Eisenhower referred in his August letter. We are now studying this proposal in my own Government. I have no blueprint to offer at this time for such an association. Essentially, however, it would be an affiliate of the International Bank which would make long-term loans for economic development repayable in whole or in part in the currency of the borrowing country. As I have said, the U.S. Government is making its own studies of the feasibility and desirability of establishing an IDA. We hope that other countries will at the same time be giving thought to the matter, and we shall look forward to having informal conversations with you. If these informal studies and conversations lead to encouraging conclusions, it would be appropriate to undertake more formal study and negotiation looking to the establishment of such an association."

Under Secretary of State for Economic Affairs, C. Douglas Dillon, Alternate Governor for the United States, at the discussion of the bank's annual report on October 9, 1958, at New Delhi, stated:

"In his remarks at the opening session of this conference, Secretary Anderson referred to a proposal which is being studied in the U.S. Government for an International Development Association. While our Government does not as yet have a detailed plan to submit with reference to such an association, we believe that any plan should take account of the following factors:

"1. As is well known, loans from the International Bank have to be repaid in hard currencies. We understand that in a number of cases the bank has had to disapprove applications for loans, not because the development project involved was without merit, but because repayment of the loan entirely in hard currency would have placed an undue strain on the borrowing country to repay. Now, if a percentage of the cost of such projects could come from a new institution affiliated with the bank which could make loans repayable at least in part with softer currencies, projects such as these might well become feasible.

"2. Our suggestion that member governments of the bank study the possibility of an International Development Association does not mean that the United States would favor any lessening of the technical lending standards of the bank. Projects submitted to the International Development Association would be considered by precisely the same management and staff which now examines projects for the bank. In other words, while an International Development Association would provide capital on more flexible terms, in a balance of payments sense, than are now possible under International Bank standards, the establishment of an International Development Association as an affiliate of the bank would assure that the new lending authority would be in the hands of skilled financial management.

"3. We ourselves are actively studying the ways and means in which an International Development Association might operate, and hope to arrive at our own conclusions within the next few months. We would meanwhile welcome the thinking of our associates in the bank on this subject. It is, of course, essential to the success of such an institution that it receive broad financial support from the industrialized countries which are members of the International Bank. Only in this way could it become an effective international instrument for development. If encouraging conclusions emerge from these studies and informal conversations, it will then be appropriate to undertake more formal negotiations.

"I would like to emphasize our belief that the difficult and complex problems of development require that all of us contribute together to their solution both financially and with our best thinking. Only in this way can we make progress toward the goal of a better living for all the peoples of the world. No one country and no small group of countries can do the job alone."

In addition, informal discussions of the International Development Association were begun with representatives of a number of governments at the annual meeting of the fund and the bank. Meanwhile, study has also been given to the International Development Association proposal within the structure of the National Advisory Council. This study is not completed and, of course, cannot be until we know more closely the views of other governments who might be interested in the creation of an International Development Association.

When further progress has been made in our discussions with foreign governments and in our own studies, we will report again to your committee.

Sincerely yours,

ROBERT B. ANDERSON,
Chairman, National Advisory Council on International Monetary and Financial Problems.

OUR ECONOMIC POLICIES

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I hold in my hand three articles from three separate but distinguished sources. The first of these articles is one by Walter Lippmann entitled "The Duty of Rich Nations." The second is in the Atlantic Monthly for February by Barbara Ward, entitled "A New Economic Strategy." And the third is a report in the Washington Post and Times Herald of this morning by J. A. Livingston, which refers to a decision of the U.S. Government to reject a bid submitted by an English firm for turbines at the Greers Ferry Dam on the Little Red River in Arkansas, a bid which was 19 percent lower than the one submitted by an American firm. In other words, the American taxpayers are paying 19 percent more for the turbines at the Greers Ferry than would have been necessary had we been willing to operate on an international competition basis.

I ask unanimous consent that these articles may appear in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE DUTY OF RICH NATIONS

(By Walter Lippmann)

The President of Argentina, Mr. Frondizi, has come to Washington and gone. Unlike Mr. Mikoyan's visit, his was a state visit in which the whole ritual for such occasions was observed. But Mr. Frondizi has left behind him for the American people to ponder what can fairly be called the most poignant, and it might be the most embarrassing, question in our foreign relations.

The question is whether we are ready to recognize the principle that rich nations in the world community, like rich individuals in their own communities, have a duty to help the poor to raise themselves out of poverty. "We cannot ignore," said President Frondizi to Congress, "the harsh fact that millions of beings in Latin America suffer from misery and backwardness * * * When there is misery and backwardness in a country not only freedom and democracy are doomed but even national sovereignty is in jeopardy."

This principle—that the rich have a duty to the poor—is not now part of our official philosophy of foreign aid. The United States has made substantial contributions, and not all of them have been wisely and effectively spent. But in relation to our wealth the contributions have not been very great. What matters most, however, is that Congress has voted these contributions on what is humanly speaking a self-defeating principle. They have not been voted on the principle that the rich have a duty to the poor but on the theory that we are subsidizing our allies in the cold war. Because Latin America has not been in the front line of the cold war, we have done comparatively little about the misery and backwardness of Latin America.

This theory—that foreign aid is an instrument of the cold war, and would not otherwise be necessary or desirable—was challenged by President Frondizi. On this point, there were as he spoke, men in high places who were prepared to understand him. Notable among them was Mr. Douglas Dillon, who is the Under Secretary of State in charge of economic affairs. On January 16 before the Foundation for Religious Action, Mr. Dillon made a speech which had little attention at the time but is of great and far-reaching consequence.

After saying that there was no need before that audience to spell out the full dimensions of the Soviet challenge, Mr. Dillon went on "to examine with you the demands being made upon our resources and upon our consciences to help raise the living standards of the peoples of Asia, Africa, Latin America. These are the areas where most of mankind lives and where the struggle between freedom and totalitarianism may ultimately be decided. The need to help these peoples forward on the road to economic progress would confront us even if communism and the Sino-Soviet bloc simply didn't exist."

Why? For the same fundamental reasons, which is at once a matter of morals and/or prudence, that we have learned to accept the view that within a nation great extremes of poverty and riches are intolerable to our consciences and subversive of the social order. We now live in a world community, and the most portentous fact about the age in which we live is that the gap between the rich peoples of Western Europe, North American and Australasia on the one hand, of Asia, Africa, and Latin America on the other, is enormous. Worse still, the gap is widening. Rich peoples are getting richer faster than the poor peoples are overcoming their poverty.

The rich countries, with a total population of about 400 million, have an average income per capita of about $1,000 a year. In the United States it is more than $2,000 a year. The underdeveloped countries, leaving out Communist China, have a population of over 1 billion and an average income of only $60 a year. During the past 50 years, the per capita income in the West has doubled, and it is rising appreciably each year. In the poorer countries, the per capita income has increased very little, and in many places it has deteriorated.

These are, I believe, the overriding facts of the times we live in and of the world in which we have to play so big a part. It is not too much to say that on our response to these facts will depend—if we do not all go up in the smoke of a world war—our prospects in the cold war, and our position in the decades to come as a world power. This does not mean, and no one should be so silly as to suppose that it does, that we who are only about 7 percent of the world's population, can eliminate the immemorial misery of half of the human race. What we can do is to raise considerably the amount we invest or lend to the key countries in Asia, Africa, and Latin America. Thus we can well afford to set aside something in the order of 5 billion annually for development and reconstruction. For that would not be much more than 1 percent of our gross national product.

The way we make our contribution is at least as important as the amount of the contribution. For insofar as we treat the contributions as a subsidy to buy allies in the cold war, they do as much, probably more, harm than they do good. For then we present ourselves in the guise of a great imperial power seeking to buy dependents, and that is a principle reason why with all the fuss about our foreign aid programs, we have been losing, not gaining, friends in the world.

The whole operation of foreign aid would wear a different face if it were founded on the principle, laid down by Mr. Dillon—that we make a contribution because it is the simple duty of the rich to help the poor. It would be a noble act, which would pay big dividends in self-respect at home and goodwill abroad, if the Government would declare the principle that to fight against poverty is a duty, not an instrument of our military strategy.

I do not myself think it is wishful thinking to believe that Congress and the people, who are now bored with foreign aid as it is presented and administered, would respond much more readily if it were inspired by a big idea, rather than by small and calculating notions of how to score points in a contest.

A NEW ECONOMIC STRATEGY

(By Barbara Ward)

A year ago, in the disturbance of Western policy after the appearance of the sputniks, much hope was pinned upon the Paris meeting of the Atlantic powers. From this conference, it was widely believed, there would come a new initiative, a new policy to snatch the advantage back from the Communists. It would be a new starting point and mark the return to positions of strength.

Can one say that the hopes were fulfilled? In the strategic and political sense, clearly, no very cheerful conclusions can be drawn from a year that includes Iraq, Lebanon, Cyprus, the renewal of hostilities in the Formosa Strait, and the stalemate in Europe. But has there not at least been some recovery in the vital sphere of economic strategy? The signs are not unpromising. Individual statesmen have spoken of the need for a new, concerted approach to world economic problems. An impressive number of reports has appeared, all pointing to the same main components of a broad policy for world development: higher monetary reserves, stabler primary prices, a greater flow of international lending. And out of these preliminaries has come an American-sponsored proposal to increase both the reserves available to the International Monetary Fund and the lending powers of the World Bank.

These are steps which could lead to sustained international development policies on a more adequate scale. One could add to this hopeful pointer the United States new readiness to consider establishing a development bank for the Americas, the passage by Congress of the Reciprocal Trade Act, and joint action by the United States, Britain, West Germany, and other creditors to stave off the acute crisis which arose last summer in India's balance of payments.

Yet these moves, however promising, leave wide open the question whether they are to lead on to a program at once large enough and permanent enough to deserve the name of a new economic strategy. The proposals for the international agencies are modest compared with the genuine scale of world need. The Indian arrangements were strictly limited and took no account of the long-term problems facing the modernization of the Indian economy. And when one turns to the possible future source of funds for any bold economic program—the parliamentary assemblies of the Western Powers and their electorates—there is no trace of the intensive preparation and education necessary if money is to be forthcoming on an adequate scale. In fact, in Congress, majority opinion was not particularly well disposed either to the enlargement of the Development Loan Fund or to the separation of economic from military aid. Yet both moves are clearly of first importance in any sustained program of economic development.

Moreover, the evidence suggests that the West's somewhat greater readiness to sponsor new economic policies in recent months does not spring from any considered Western estimate of world need, but—like the Lebanon landings or the reinforcements in Formosa—is one more reaction to Communist pressure. Three years ago, 2 years ago, the talk was in the main of ending foreign aid and getting the world back to normal economic methods—whatever "normal" may mean in the atomic age. The changed mood of today reflects the piling up of evidence on the scale and purposiveness of the Soviet economic offensive. Western action is not so much a strategy in its own right as a reaction to someone else's. The initiative, as in the military sphere, rests elsewhere.

How has this curious situation arisen? For curious it is that the Western Powers, led by America, should today be mainly acting and reacting to Communist maneuvers when, not much more than a decade ago, America stood at the peak of its power while Russia was decimated by invasion and slaughter and China struggled in the last throes of 50 years of revolution and civil war. So violent a change in political fortunes is not fortuitous. It points to profounder causes than any temporary confusion of policy or failure in diplomatic tactics. In fact, it can be argued that the loss of initiative in recent years springs from two of the deepest conceivable misconceptions any state or group of states can entertain. In the first place, they mistake the nature of the world in which they have to live and act. In the second place, as a result of this misjudgment, they have no real desire to act at all. If the Western Powers have lost the initiative, basically it is because they have had no desire or have seen no need to keep it. Thus, before there is any discussion of the kind of concrete policies that the West might pursue to restore its position vis-a-vis communism, there is a more fundamental issue at stake. It is to persuade leaders and voters in the West that the world, far from being a cozy self-regulated world which would roll merrily along were it not disturbed by meddlesome Communists, is on the contrary a world of violence, catastrophe, and deepening revolution and one in which whole societies will founder if they try to rely simply on the sailing charts for calm weather. Only if this reality is accepted can the Western Powers push safely on through the hurricane.

For a hurricane it is. Let us look first at the scale of the contemporary revolution. Perhaps it would be more accurate to speak of the five or six revolutions, all of which are going on simultaneously over the face of the earth. The scientific revolution, the industrial revolution, the technological revolution, the national and popular revolution—begun and now more or less tamed in the Atlantic arena—are violently at work everywhere else and under conditions which, far from taming them, inflame them further.

In the West, the industrial revolution slightly preceded the stupendous medical revolution of lengthened life and lowered infant mortality rates. Resources and births have increased together. In Asia and Africa, and to some degree in Latin America, the surge of births has come first. By the year 2000, whatever steps are taken to discourage further expansion, the present population of the world will have more than doubled—in itself an astounding fact, since it means that in 4 decades humanity will increase by the number it has taken a hundred millenniums and more to produce. The bulk of this expansion, 1.3 billion to 3.6 billion, will occur in Asia, where the pressure of population on resources is already at its heaviest.

The only hope of avoiding catastrophe in the wake of such expansion is a rapid modernization and industrialization of the rest of the world economy. But the obstacles are formidable indeed. In the Atlantic area, margins for the saving needed to underpin industrialization were available, in part because of a vast endowment of coal and iron, in part because of a dynamic agriculture and large reserves of empty land. In Asia—outside Siberia—the mineral endowment is on a smaller scale; there is no spare land; agriculture is profoundly conservative. Savings, the basis of all industrialization, are thus incomparably more difficult to accumulate.

Again, in the West, industry and science did not break in overnight almost as revelations. They grew up steadily in a society of widespread means and education. A middle class of savers, entrepreneurs, and savants existed before the technological revolution began. In Asia and Africa and large parts of Latin America, this preparation has been almost wholly lacking. The new ideas and possibilities strike into feudal or tribal societies with the force of an earthquake, throwing down old patterns and ways of thought, tearing out the familiar psychological landmarks, and creating a havoc of both hope and fear.

Above all, modern industrial society was built in the West when Western power and prestige were virtually unchallenged. At the turn of the 19th century, all but a few parts of the globe were under one form or another of Western control. Western prosperity expanded in a world made one by its ideas and its commerce. There never was a time when so wide a political order rested on such an unobtrusive and inexpensive foundation of power. For an expanding America, in particular, it was world order at no cost at all.

But Asia and Africa do not have to modernize among the ruins of the old system. They have to do so between the competing enmities of the cold war, the catchcries of propaganda, the restless probings of one set of powers, the uncertain ripostes of the other. Only now, when local order and stable rule have come into question, as they have in Indonesia or Burma, can one see the relevance to economic development of internal security and steady government.

There is some realization in the West of all these separate, interwoven upheavals. What is lacking is a full appreciation of their profoundest effect. We are witnessing today a world which, thrown into such a furnace of stress and change, has become plastic, fluid, moldable to an almost inconceivable degree. At a time when everything seems to be changing, the old shapes lose their power to hold; old pieties dissolve; loyalties snap; regimes fall between midnight and morning; and one has the impression of whole societies given over to formless energies which seek some new mold to contain and channel them.

Such periods are not new in history. The collapse of medieval Christendom released energy into the new nation state. The fall of the absolute dynasties let loose the liberal and popular ideals of the American and French Revolutions. What is new is the scale of the restlessness, the degree of the upheaval, the extent to which no aspect of human existence—political, economical, social, philosophical—is left untouched. If ever the revolutionary energies of man were running free of the ancient ways and seeking to scour out new channels, the time is now, and if men in the West will only listen, they will hear everywhere the roar of troubled waters and the gale of the world rising to hurricane force.

This is the context within which to assess the true challenge of communism. Communism is the cause of none of the world's contemporary revolutions. Technology, medical advance, science, industrialization, rationalism, the national idea, popular claims and aspirations—all of these were invented and launched in the West and would be remaking the world even if Marx had never left the Rhineland. The significance of communism is that at a time of extreme flux—in power, in thought, in technology—it offers the world a series of molds or patterns into which the released energies may flow. It offers formative ideas to the inchoate energy of change.

To nations facing the hard choices of industrialization, communism presents the pattern of forced-draft savings and investment worked out in the Soviet plans. To the masses stirred by the hopes of a more abundant life, it preaches social revolution and economic equality. To nations chafing at their poverty and lack of influence, it recalls the bogy of Western imperial control and offers its own trade and aid "without political strings or concessions." Above all, the leaders of communism link all these separate cajoleries together within a broader picture of world liberation and unity and brotherhood and derive from it, as from a religious faith, the energy and dedication to include all people of mankind within the scope of their plans and efforts.

Wherever there is an opening for influence or trouble, there the Communists are at work: with arms and dams for Egypt, with aid and barter for Burma and Ceylon, with recognition and offers of capital for Guinea on the eve of independence, with massive offers of trade and credits in Latin America. More pertinent even than the aim itself is the unrelenting perseverance with which it is pursued. There are no isolationist Communists. The troubled, changing, violent, catastrophic, contemporary world is their chosen field of operation. Indeed, they welcome the chaos on which they can more easily stamp the pattern of their faith. The prophets of materialism are, in the last analysis, the most profoundly devoted to the triumph of the idea.

Here is matter enough for the ironists of history. But there is a greater irony still. The Western Powers themselves launched every one of the world's contemporary revolutions. They carried them across the oceans and round the world. They set in motion the vast forces of contemporary change and in doing so never doubted that what they did was of profound concern to the entire human race. Yet today, wealthy, complacent, unimaginative, they appear indifferent to the stirring, protean world of change and revolution in which three-quarters of the human race is struggling for the forms of a new life. There is not a single Western initiative that embraces change, not one idea or policy for which the sustained Western dedication is forthcoming. In our contemporary world, in short, the idealists of the West appear to think of nothing beyond their material interests, while the materialists of the East seek to remake the face of the earth by the force of their ideas.

The present Western failure in energy and dedication is tragic and ironic not only in comparison with Communist effort and vision. A further irony is that it contradicts the lessons of the West's most recent diplomatic experience. Wherever, since the war, an element of vision and generosity has appeared in Western policies, the outcome has been effectiveness and achievement. The Marshall plan recreated Western Europe and laid the foundations on which a new supernational unity may now be built. British readiness to grant independence peaceably has set up a multiracial family of nations in the face of the old imperial control. So long as France did nothing but fight for its colonies, it lost them; but General de Gaulle's vision of an interdependent community may yet remake France and its African provinces together. Only where Western policy has been purely defensive and traditional, as in the Baghdad Pact, has it been a total failure. Even NATO is unstable, because it contrives to be a military alliance and nothing more.

But the greatest irony of all is that if the Western Powers could bring themselves to see the need of recovering the initiative, they would have little difficulty in evolving an effective policy for doing so. The fact is that much of the theoretical groundwork has already been completed, for the simple reason that the revolution in process all around the world today practically determines by its nature the sort of policy that could be pursued.

The root of the revolution is the world's growth of population. Only intensive modernization can create the resources to feed and clothe and house the new multitudes. Modernization in turn depends entirely upon the ability to save, to accumulate more capital than is consumed in daily living or by a growing birth rate. Here, then, is the core of policy—to help the world to save and, in political terms, to do so without the Draconian discipline of communism. The sources of saving, which vary from land to land according to its conditions and environment, include rising export incomes, dynamic agriculture, infra-structure—roads, ports, public utilities, and the even more vital investment in education and training—and all the various forms of industrial growth. Effective international programs need therefore to cover trade, investment, and training.

There is nothing new in all this. Virtually every element of an effective international policy has been discussed repeatedly in the last 10 years, and much invaluable experience has been gained in a great variety of experiments. Simply to pick out the main heads of agreement already reached gives the framework of a workable strategy. In the field of trade, the need is for higher working reserves to underpin world commerce—for example, by tripling or quadrupling the sums available to the International Monetary Fund—and for a bolder approach to tariff policy. Between industrialized nations it could take the form of further low tariff or free trade areas. Between industrialized and primary producing groups it could concentrate on giving greater relief to the primary producers, who at present are subject to discrimination all along the line, through revenue taxes on such exports as tea and coffee, through quotas on minerals and restrictions on farm products, and through high protection against cheap textiles, which are usually the first manufactured exports emergent economies such as India can produce.

In the sphere of capital the need is to assess the underdeveloped nation's need for external assistance, over and above its own capacity to save and to provide capital through appropriate agencies—public, private, or international—and in appropriate forms, among them commercial loans; World Bank advances, low-interest-rate, long-term credits; and some direct grants. At the moment the emergent territories could not usefully absorb much more than $3 billion a year in development loans, though their absorptive capacity will increase. Certainly if the wealthier nations contributed 1 percent of their national incomes each year to world development, they could comfortably cover all present needs, and, if the percentage were maintained while their own incomes rose, future needs could be met as well.

The field of training is not yet well explored, and possibly a preliminary report on needs and opportunities would have to be completed before new decisions could be taken. But existing training schemes and the various technical missions scattered over the world could provide invaluable experience. In this, as in other fields, the pilot plans already exist. In short, there is enough material for action—if action is the aim. One comes back to the central point that the missing element is not the content of policy but the decision to have one. Once the decision is taken, however, there are useful precedents upon which to act. For instance, the U.S. Government might repeat the technique which was used successfully in the case of a previous experiment in international cooperation: the United Nations, arranging a meeting of interested nations, led them to agree on aims and objectives and persuaded those who could afford it to pledge 1 percent of national income to finance the organization which was to restore the ravages of war.

This approach is preferable to the preliminaries of the Marshall plan, for then only America could afford to be a contributor, whereas the principle of any present plan should be that all the wealthy states of the world—most of them in the West—play their part. But in another sense the Marshall technique is a sound analogy, for the precedent of an expert inquiry into needs and possibilities, which was adopted in 1948, might be followed again today. True, the pattern could not be so definite nor the time limit so precise; to restore a single, developed, industrial region is one thing, to encourage the beginnings or the expansion of modernization in many different parts of the world is quite another. Yet the technique of setting experts to work on a priority plan is a sound one, and it is hard to think of any other method that could launch the new policy with greater clarity and effect.

Would the new effort require new institutions as did UNRRA or the Marshall plan? There is some danger in proliferating agencies in a world already cluttered up with so many, but methods can be evolved whereby the multiplication of extra machinery could be avoided. For instance, the conference convened by the United States might take the form of a special meeting of the United Nations General Assembly, and the commission of experts could be appointed by the Assembly itself. This approach would have the incidental advantage of compelling the Russians to make their attitude clear. If, as Mr. Khrushchev says, they do not "give a kopeck for cooperating with the imperialists," they will be obliged to withdraw. If, on the other hand, they hesitate to flout world opinion and decide to stay in, the result will be at least some measure of international control over their program of assistance. Either way, the nations of the world will know more clearly where they stand. A further advantage of using a primarily international approach is that it would make such experienced institutions as the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund the chief agents of policy. It would probably be necessary to create one new agency—an International Development Authority—to cover long-term, low-interest-rate loans which lie outside the scope of the World Bank, but in most other fields an appropriate agency exists already. The new policy itself would probably require no more new machinery than a small permanent steering committee, possibly of the General Assembly, which would work on the same lines as did the Organization for European Economic Cooperation (OEEC) within the Marshall plan.

An international approach on these lines does not preclude nations from continuing their own direct aid programs over and above the relatively small sum of 1 percent of national income pledged to the international experiment. It interfers in no way with private business arrangements. Rather it encourages them by giving businessmen the assurance of a steadily expanding world economy.

But the international approach does play an indispensable part in what may well be the new policy's most vital aspect. So long as any scheme or strategy can be twisted to represent nothing more than Western patronage or largess or, worse still, Western self-interest and self-defense, it will fail in its most urgent aim—that of projecting new ideas, new possibilities, and new visions into our confused and searching world. What the new program should represent, at the deepest level of meaning, is the recognition by the Western Powers of their solidarity with the human race.

Nothing is harder to project. For 300 years we in the West have ridden roughshod over the world and have emerged from this dominance wealthy beyond most people's dreams and with an unhealthy reputation for racial arrogance and cultural complacency. All this—which is the staple of Communist propaganda—represents a formidable obstacle to human communication and, hence, to the projection of Western concepts of a free society, of law, of private initiative, of generosity and justice and personal responsibility. If, however, the central purpose of Western policy were now to work side by side with other peoples in the revolutionary tasks of modernization, sharing experience with them, working out jointly the strategy of progress, matching their labor with capital, opening wide the doors for training and education, then, indeed, the climate of world opinion could be remade and the Western Powers might even seem to be what their Christian ethic has always told them they should be—united among themselves and bound by a common spirit of brotherhood to all mankind.

THE PECCADILLO AT GREERS FERRY

(By J. A. Livingston)

"The Peccadillo at Greers Ferry." In that kindly fashion, the London Economist refers to the award of a turbine contract to the Baldwin-Lima-Hamilton Corp., outside Philadelphia, instead of the English Electric Co., which submitted a 19 percent lower bid.

The turbines were for the Greers Ferry Dam on the Little Red River in Arkansas. The U.S. Government decided to keep the business at home for reasons of national defense. The Economist calls that "transparent cant," and suggests that the real reason was to "safeguard employment" in an area in which unemployment has been high.

Nevertheless, the Economist pardons the decision as "part of a familiar pattern," in which American politicians give an inch to save a yard. The award was made just before "a decision has to be reached on the much bigger demand by a group of American producers for a complete ban on the import of certain types of electrical machinery, against which it is vastly more important that Washington should stand firm."

MARKETS, NOT LOANS

But a larger question arises: How good is American policy at making friends and influencing peoples?

"The distinguishing feature of liberal Americans today (liberal Republicans as well as liberal Democrats)," says the Economist, "is their welcome recognition that, provided there is no thermonuclear war, the whole future balance of international manpower is likely to depend on one factor: on whether the poorer nations can be offered the prospect of getting richer within the free world's economic and political system than they would within the Communist one. But the delusion of western politicians is that, to achive this prospect, the main problem is * * * to lend these countries money; instead * * * it is * * * to open markets to them."

In the struggle with Soviet Russia for the loyalty of the uncommitted nations of the world, we repeat to ourselves and other nations that if people have more food, clothing, and shelter—a stake in living—they'll resist communism. So we try to help countries with low living standards to produce for themselves.

BITTER LESSON FOR THE FREE WORLD

But, says the Economist, "if once [nations] are industrialized [and] they find that their cheap labor goods are shut out by the advanced countries of the West (as Japan's were shut out), then the free world will soon learn a bitter lesson: that the peoples most likely to be tempted toward communism are not the very poor, very dormant and illiterate but the half awake, and half educated who feel that they are being prevented by recognizable capitalists from becoming richer as quickly as their capabilities ought to allow."

America is a country of immense, diverse and conflicting interests. To the city of Philadelphia, an award of a contract to Baldwin-Lima-Hamilton Corp. is immediately helpful. It means jobs, payrolls, retail sales. But Philadelphia is a seaport. Anything that throttles international commerce is detrimental to Philadelphia in the long run.

We, in the United States, have grown strong industrially on foreign trade. In early days, we exported our wheat and cotton; we purchased manufactures. Then, when we developed manufactures of our own, we exported them. We had to export. Exports paid off the foreign debt.

FEATHERBEDDING OUR INDUSTRIES

Today we are a creditor Nation. We have high living standards and pay high wages. The twin historic justifications of such high wages are alert, skilled workingmen who give an honest day's work for an honest day's pay and the most modern machinery for the workingmen to use.

We comfort ourselves by saying we can compete with any manufacturers anywhere because of our technological skills and our equipment. But if we do not submit industrial firms to the rigors of price competition, how will they be under pressure to get costs down? It is not only against Great Britain that we must compete. In the world of tomorrow, we'll have to compete with Soviet Russia as well as other countries. We can't do that by featherbedding our industries.

Peccadilloes are tolerable only if they don't become precedents. Exceptions are acceptable only if they don't become the rule.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I think the time has come for Americans to realize that the international economic policies of this Nation may well prove to be more disastrous to our future than the alleged neglect of our missile program. Miss Ward in her article in the Atlantic Monthly points out that the world revolution we face today is not a Communist revolution primarily but is in fact one arising out of "technology, medical advance, science, industrialization, rationalism, the national idea, popular claims, and aspirations," all ideas which were "invented and launched in the West and would be remaking the world even if Marx had never left the Rhineland." The world in which we live, even if there were no Communists would be a world of violence, catastrophe, and deepening revolution and one in which whole societies will founder if they try to rely simply on the sailing charts for calm weather."

And that is precisely what we are doing in this country. Since the war every time the Nation has shown an element of vision for "generosity as appeared in Western policies, the outcome has been effectiveness and achievement," suggests Miss Ward. It is only when "Western policy has been purely defensive and traditional, as in the Baghdad Pact, that it has been a total failure."

The "Peccadillo at Greers Ferry" which Mr. Livingston describes in his article is a classic example of an economic policy which is not consistent with American traditions of free enterprise. We seem unwilling to face the rigors of price competition. We turn inward to protect ourselves when we should be looking abroad for opportunities of expansion.

Miss Ward suggests that "if the wealthier nations contributed 1 percent of their national incomes every year to world development, they could comfortably cover all present needs." She suggests, and here I am inclined to agree, that the missing element is not that we do not know what to do, but that there has been no decision and no leadership toward a solid policy to live and to lead in an economically revolutionary world.

Mr. Lippmann in his column makes the point that "the rich have a duty to the poor." He observes that this is "not now a part of our official philosophy of foreign aid."

Mr. President, the American people may not be ready as yet to go as far as to make this a cardinal concept of foreign policy.

I suggest that if the time has not come for us to accept this as a philosophy of our foreign policy, we should at least be able to recognize and live with the kind of competition we developed and which is basic to our system that is illustrated in the Greers Ferry contract.

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT TO 10:30 A.M. ON THURSDAY NEXT

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business today, it stand in adjournment until 10:30 a.m. on Thursday next. By way of explanation, I should like to say that we will have a joint session of the two Houses on that day at 11 a.m. in the House Chamber, in commemoration of the 150th anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln. My reason for desiring that the Senate shall meet at 10:30 is so that we may have a brief morning hour, have a quorum call, and proceed to the other House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I should like to state that at the conclusion of the morning hour today we expect to bring up by motion two noncontroversial measures, which are now on the calendar. One of them was introduced by the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND], and has been reported by the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, headed by the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL]. The other measure is a Senate concurrent resolution which was submitted by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], and was also reported by the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

THE DIRECTOR OF THE INTERNATIONAL COOPERATION ADMINISTRATION

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I have read with considerable interest a newspaper article in the New York Times of last Saturday, written by Mr. E. W. Kenworthy, and a column this morning by Mr. Joseph Alsop in the Washington Post and Times Herald, concerning the case of Henry Labouisse. I ask unanimous consent that these two articles be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MR. SMITH LEAVES WASHINGTON AFTER ALCORN REVISES SCENARIO

(By E. W. Kenworthy)

WASHINGTON, February 6.—The Republican National Committee was grinding out a sequel today to "Mr. Smith Goes to Washington," and party managers hoped it would do well at the party's box office.

Mr. Smith—in this case Mr. James H. Smith, Jr.—quietly left Washington for his home in Aspen, Colo., last Saturday. This was a few hours after he had turned in his resignation as Director of the International Cooperation Administration.

Mr. Smith went home, it was understood, a disappointed man, unlike the Mr. Smith of the film success of the 1930's, who managed to survive the political pitfalls of Washington.

The present Mr. Smith had not received the appointment to succeed his friend, Thomas S. Gates, Jr., as Secretary of the Navy as he had confidently expected and as the administration has confidently planned.

Mr. Smith had taken the ICA job in the summer of 1957 on the understanding that he would leave it in January 1959. He was highly regarded in the administration for his performance in the post, and for his prior service as Assistant Secretary of the Navy.

The barrier was placed in Mr. Smith's path, administration and party officials agreed today, by Meade Alcorn, Republican national chairman. Mr. Alcorn was also said to be blocking the appointment of a Connecticut Democrat as Mr. Smith's successor.

Republican politicians made no secret of the fact that Mr. Alcorn had put a big black mark against Mr. Smith more than a year ago, shortly after Mr. Smith became head of the ICA, the foreign aid agency.

At that time, it was said, Mr. Smith and Mr. Alcorn had a frank talk during which time Mr. Smith told Mr. Alcorn that he was not going to give jobs to Republicans simply because they were Republicans.

Since then, several little black marks have been set against Mr. Smith's name in the book kept at party headquarters at 1625 I Street.

ACCEPTED AND REJECTED

One of these involved a person working at party headquarters—a trained professional worker, it was said—who applied for a job at ICA and was accepted. When Mr. Smith learned that this person had been working at Republican headquarters, it was related, he refused to approve the appointment.

One party official summed up today Mr. Alcorn's attitude toward Mr. Smith:

Jimmie Smith was unnecessarily neutral.

A further development in Mr. Smith's story, it was reported, concerned Henry R. Labouisse, a long-time Government official. C. Douglas Dillon, Under Secretary of State for Economic Affairs has been suggesting Mr. Labouisse as the new director of ICA.

SERVED U.N. IN NEAR EAST

Mr. Labouisse retired last June as director of the United Nations relief and works agency for Palestine refugees. Prior to his 4 years in the Near East, he had held several State Department posts connected with foreign aid.

Because of this professional experience Mr. Dillon wanted Mr. Labouisse. This choice had been cleared all the way up to the White House, officials said today.

However, Mr. Labouisse comes from Connecticut—the home State of Mr. Alcorn, and he registered there as a Democrat in 1941. An associate explained today that this was more than Mr. Alcorn could be expected to endure without outcry.

Mr. Alcorn's outcries, it was said, have induced a sympathetic response from Senator PRESCOTT BUSH, Republican, of Connecticut.

Senator BUSH has said that if the administration is "looking for a professional" to head International Cooperation Administration it can find him in Leonard J. Saccio, now the agency's Deputy Director.

Mr. Saccio comes from Connecticut. He is a Republican.

Associates of Mr. Smith gave this account of how he came to Washington and left it.

When he took the ICA job, it was said, he was led to believe, these officials said, that in due time he would succeed Robert Cutler as Special Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs.

However, Mr. Cutler resigned for health reasons last June, too soon for Mr. Smith to take his post. As a consequence Gordon Gray, head of the Office of Defense Mobilization, was appointed to succeed Mr. Cutler.

Some time ago Secretary Gates, who was planning to resign, approached his Under Secretary, William F. Franke, and asked if it were true, as he had been informed, that Mrs. Franke did not wish a promotion to Secretary for health reasons. Mr. Franke, according to officials, said this was so.

Thereupon, it was said, Mr. Gates undertook to get the appointment for his friend, Mr. Smith.

According to associates of Mr. Smith, Mr. Gates told Mr. Smith that everything was set. But Mr. Gates also told others the same thing, and the appointment got in the papers before the White House had given the final word.

Thereupon, it was said, Mr. Alcorn got busy. Mr. Franke was persuaded to change his mind.

Mr. Smith left Washington last Saturday. On Monday Mr. Gates' resignation was announced, effective next June. His successor will be Mr. Franke.

THE CASE OF HENRY LABOUISSE

(By Joseph Alsop)

Henry Labouisse is a genial, unassuming, deceptively ordinary seeming man who belongs to a very special category, the category of Americans to whom every citizen of this Republic ought to feel personally indebted.

In the early stages of his career, in the Foreign Service, and for a time in the foreign aid administration, he turned in a most notable performance; but it was not this which created the debt each one of us owes to him. The debt began to be incurred when Labouisse accepted one of the most difficult and heart rending posts in the world today, the directorship of the United Nations Relief Agency for the tragic Arab refugees from Palestine.

There was no need for Labouisse to leave everything friendly and familiar, and go to the Middle East with his beautiful and brilliant wife, the former Eve Curie. By any ordinary standard, the appointment Labouisse accepted was both repellent and terrifying.

The million uprooted Arabs who are condemned to the grim death-in-life of the refugee camps were then suffering from extreme mass neurosis. Their resentment against the world's injustice was too bitter; their suspicions were too inflamed. They would begin one of their wolfish riots on almost any pretext. The refugee problem was, in fact, a gigantic ulcer, on the very point of bursting with unforeseeable consequences.

When Henry Labouisse took over, it was physically dangerous for the U.N. personnel to enter some of the refugee camps. As an American, a representative of the nation held responsible for sponsoring the Palestine partition, Labouisse was under extra suspicion. Yet by tact and humor and cool courage, by wonderful improvising from small resources, by model administration under the worst conditions, and above all, by back-breaking, unending, gruelling hard work, Labouisse won the day.

He could not cure the ulcer that is the refugee problem. No one could do that. But he won the confidence and even the affection of these tragic people. He improved conditions in the terrible camps in many different ways. He reduced the inflation of the ulcer, by these means, to a point that was no longer acutely dangerous. And all this he did without any great increase of the niggardly pittance of a few cents per person per day that the United States and the other contributing nations gave to the U.N. for refugee care.

Such, then, was the achievement of Henry Labouisse when he came home at last some months ago. Such, then was the man whom Deputy Under Secretary of State Douglas Dillon requested to take over the International Cooperation Administration, when Dillon learned that the foreign aid job was about to be vacated by James H. Smith.

The foreign aid job is notoriously the hardest major post to fill in the Government today; and it was something of a sacrifice on Labouisse's part to agree to leave his well-earned retirement for this new post. Secretary John Foster Dulles and the whole State Department high command were enthusiastic for the appointment. Labouisse's name went to the White House with the highest recommendations.

At the White House, however, the nomination ran, head-on, into the peculiar situation created by President Eisenhower's positive detestation of his secondary role as leader of the Republican Party. Despite his semi-annual exhortations to the party rank and file to get out and work, the President notoriously avoids the normal political tasks of his office. But in order to justify this avoidance and to control the party officials, the President has done something that his most politically active predecessors never did. He has given the Republican National Committee and its chairman, Meade Alcorn, a right of veto over all appointments.

Alcorn's files of jobseekers of course contain no remotely suitable candidate for the foreign aid job. A score of men were begged to take the job and refused it, before James H. Smith was finally induced to serve. And above all officials, the foreign and chief needs to enjoy bipartisan confidence on Capitol Hill.

Despite these important considerations, Alcorn furiously vetoed the Labouisse appointment on the sole ground that the wholly a-political Labouisse was not a Republican. The President, despite his repeatedly professed enthusiasm for the foreign aid program, has been too remote from the struggle, too little interested in the problem, too busy quail-shooting with George Humphrey, to bother to overrule the national committee chairman. When you recall the great public servants Harry S. Truman recruited from Republican ranks, it seems a little odd to see the Eisenhower crusaders enforcing the crudest rules of old-fashioned pork-and-patronage politics, with certain detriment to the public service of the United States.

Mr. CLARK subsequently said: Mr. President, I wish to refer briefly to the article entitled "The Case of Henry Labouisse," written by Joseph Alsop, and published today in the Washington Post. I have been informed that permission has already been granted, at the request of one of my colleagues, to have the article printed in today's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Therefore, at this time I should like to say that I wish to vouch for and affirm everything Mr. Alsop states in the article. I believe it shows a shocking condition of political partisanship; and I hope we shall soon put an end to the business of not allowing fine, first-class public servants to do the work, for the benefit of their country, which they are so eminently qualified to do.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, the essence of these articles is that the Republican National Committee and its Chairman Meade Alcorn have in effect been able to force Mr. Smith, the just resigned Director of the ICA, to leave Washington, and to veto the nomination to that post of Mr. Henry Labouisse. Mr. President, I have no intention of trying to deny the interest of any national committee in political appointments. It seems to me the Labouisse case is going too far, however.

Members of the Committee on Foreign Relations have for some years been concerned with the poor quality of some of the appointments which have been made to ambassadorial posts and to high posts in the Department of State and related agencies. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a letter which Chairman GREEN wrote to Secretary Dulles on April 3, 1957.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

APRIL 3, 1957.

The SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SECRETARY DULLES: I desire to express to you in a completely nonpartisan spirit my deep concern about ambassadorial appointments.

In view of the heavy responsibilities of the United States throughout the world and the importance to us of relations with other countries, we should have first-rate ambassadors in every post. We choose ambassadors both from the ranks of the career service and from outside the Government service, and the benefits of this practice can be readily demonstrated. We should not, however, accept the conclusion that some years of satisfactory service, either in the Foreign Service, or in some nongovernmental activity, automatically qualify a man to be a good ambassador. The test in every case should be whether a nominee for a particular post is the American who can best serve the interests of this country there.

There are special problems arising from the fact that certain posts are very expensive. I am glad to have the Department's letter of March 6, 1957, stating that a study of the matter is underway. The Committee on Foreign Relations will no doubt give sympathetic consideration to such recommendations as you may make.

It is generally known that Presidents and Secretaries of State of both political parties have been under pressure from those who feel that an ambassadorship is a reward for past service or help. In my opinion, we can no longer afford to give way to such pressure in appointment-making.

The Committee on Foreign Relations has always recognized the primary responsibility of the Executive in making such appointments and has been reluctant to refuse consent to a nomination unless there is an obvious reason to do so. The committee has on occasions given the benefit of the doubt to nominees. It seems to me, however, an insufficient reason that there is no real objection to the nomination, there should also be an affirmative reason for it—namely, that the nominee has outstanding qualifications for the position. It should be obvious in each case, whether the nominee is a career man or not, that his record, his intelligence, his background, and his attitude are such that he will ably serve our country in his assignment.

I have made this letter the subject of discussion in executive session by the Committee on Foreign Relations and it represents the consensus of the views of all the members of the committee.

Sincerely yours,

THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN,
Chairman.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, in this letter Chairman GREEN said:

It is generally known that Presidents and Secretaries of State of both political parties have been under pressure from those who feel that an ambassadorship is a reward for past service or help. In my opinion, we can no longer afford to give way to such pressure in appointment-making.

Mr. President, on February 5 I wrote to the Secretary reiterating the point made in Senator GREEN's letter of April 3, and asked that the executive branch furnish the committee with certain additional information prior to its consideration of nominations. The important paragraph from this letter reads as follows:

It has seemed to me that if the committee is properly to exercise its advice and consent function in connection with ambassadorial appointments, it is important that it have not only the usual biographic data and statement regarding security clearances, but that it also receive for its confidential use certain other information which the President must consider prior to filling one of these important posts. Frankly, I do not know precisely what form this information may take. I would assume, however, that prior to submitting such appointments, the Department and the President must have information before them of the kind which would normally be utilized by a corporation—or perhaps a college president—prior to filling important positions. With respect to ambassadorial appointments, for example, I would think the authorities concerned with the appointments would want to know of the candidate's language ability, his ability as an administrator, his ability to make friends, the nature and depth of his interest in foreign affairs generally, as well as specifically in the country to which he is being sent, the interests which may be brought to bear on him in his post, and similar matters.

I hope, Mr. President, that the Department of State and the President will be able to resist pressures from any national committee which tends to put partisan considerations above those of the national interest.

BALANCING THE BUDGET

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, I was very much interested in the speeches just made by both the majority leader and the minority leader, in which they expressed their enthusiastic support of a balanced budget. I was particularly interested in the debate as to which of the two political parties has been the best supporter of a balanced budget. There is nothing unusual about such debates. We have heard them on the floor of the Senate frequently during the past several years. We have read the same promises in every political platform. In every political platform adopted in the past 20 years both parties have enthusiastically endorsed and pledged support of a balanced budget. But the real question is not which political party talks the loudest but rather which party when in power carries out its promises.

Mr. President, if speeches and platforms meant anything unquestionably the Democratic Party would win the argument. They talk big, but unfortunately they never carry out their promises. No political party ever made a stronger pledge for a balanced budget than that which was made by the Democratic Party in its platform of 1932. I think it might be well to read that part of the Democratic platform for 1932 in which a balanced budget was advocated:

Remember, this was the platform under which the New Deal party was elected. I quote:

We advocate an immediate and drastic reduction of governmental expenditures by abolishing useless commissions and offices, consolidating departments and bureaus, and eliminating extravagance, to accomplish a saving of not less than 25 percent in the cost of Federal Government * * * and we call upon the Democratic Party in the States to make a zealous effort to achieve a proportionate result.

We favor maintenance of the national credit by a Federal budget annually balanced on the basis of accurate executive estimates within revenues, raised by a system of taxation levied on the principle of ability to pay.

We believe that a party platform is a covenant with the people to be faithfully kept by the party when entrusted with power, and that the people are entitled to know in plain words the terms of the contract to which they are asked to subscribe.

That, Mr. President, was the balanced-budget plank in the Democratic platform of 1932. With that platform the Democratic Party overwhelmingly took control of the Government.

Then what happened? They promptly forgot it.

Instead of balancing the budget they launched the wildest spending program that our country has ever witnessed. Instead of economy and balanced budgets the New Deal slogan of the day became tax, spend, and elect.

Going back and examining the record of the two political parties since 1900, we find that the Democratic Party has had control of the Government in 26 years out of 59. In arriving at the 26 years, I have eliminated from the Democrats' responsibility the Republican 80th Congress because none other than President Truman, who was in the White House at that time, disclaimed any responsibility for anything which happened during the 80th Congress. He said that those 2 years were the sole responsibility of the Republican Party. As one who was a Member of the 80th Congress, I am proud to accept the responsibility for what was done in those 2 years. So I am transferring those 2 years from the Democratic side of the ledger and assigning them to the Republican Party. That leaves the Democratic Party responsible for 26 years and the Republican Party for 33 years since 1900.

First, let us consider the 26 years in which the Democratic Party had control of the Government. We find that, notwithstanding their promises in their platform of 1932 for a balanced budget, the Democratic Party has lived within its income in only 3 years since 1900. At no other time since 1900 has the Democratic Party lived within its income on a national level.

In the face of this deficit spending record in 1948 we find the Democratic Party still promising a balanced budget. I quote from their 1948 platform:

> We pledge the continued maintenance of those sound fiscal policies which under Democratic leadership have brought about a balanced budget and reduction of the public debt.

But the New Deal promises of a balanced budget have in the past been ignored just as they are in the voting record of the 1959 New Dealers. Only last week they raised two authorization bills enough over budgetary estimates to destroy any chance for a balanced budget for 1960.

Certainly there is merit to some of these programs, and it is not pleasant always to be put in the position of saying "No" to the requests for increased appropriations. Each increase individually may not seem so important, but when added together they spell deficits.

Mr. President, in spite of all the Democrat talk about the need for a balanced budget, during the 26 years in which they had control of the Government they showed a surplus in only 3 years. One of the surpluses was in 1916, a surplus of $48,487,346. In 1920 they showed a surplus of $291 million. In 1951 they showed a surplus of $3,500 million.

When one takes into consideration the total of the surpluses in those 3 years in which the Democratic Party operated within its income and subtracts them from the deficits which they accumulated during the other 23 years they were in control of the Government, the record will show that the Democratic Party spent a total of $265 billion more than it took in during the 26 years it had control of the Government. That $265 billion represents our national debt, about which we hear so many cries and see so many crocodile tears shed. But that Democratic debt costs the American taxpayers $8 billion in interest annually.

The Senate was treated to a lecture the other day about the need for the American people to spend many more billions of dollars in order to reach outer space. I do not belittle the need for studying those problems dealing with the exploration of space, but it is interesting to note that if the $265 billion deficit which the Democratic Party has accumulated during their 26 years were converted into dollar bills, the bills would form a blanket 15 feet wide reaching from the earth to the moon.

Now, let us examine the record of the Republican Party. During the 33 years since 1900 when the Republican Party has had control of the Government, the Republicans have had a balanced budget in 22 years. In only 11 years has the Republican Party operated our Government at a deficit.

When one takes the accumulated totals of the deficits of the Republican Party for 11 years and subtracts from them the total of the accumulated surpluses he will find that the Republican Party spent only $2.1 billion over and above what was taken in during their 33 years of operations. I am not boasting about a deficit, but certainly it is a record to be proud of when it is compared with the $265 billion which was spent by the Democrats beyond the income in their 26 years of operation.

In all fairness it should be pointed out that the deficit of the Republican Party does not include the estimated deficit for 1959. This deficit is estimated to be from $10 billion to $12 billion.

It is well to point out that during the time since 1900 the record clearly shows that the only political party which can properly boast of having carried its promise of a balanced budget has been the Republican Party. All that the New Deal members of the Democratic Party have ever done in this connection is talk.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a table showing the record of deficits and surpluses under both parties since 1900.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[1] Republican 80th Cong. President Truman disclaimed all responsibility.

Source: 1957 Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, pp. 336-339.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, this table was compiled from the 1957 Report of the Secretary of the Treasury to Congress, pages 336–339.

Mr. President, I ask Senators on the other side of the aisle who are so enthusiastically supporting the principle of a balanced budget to join the Republican Party in votes to support that objective. After all, speeches alone do not mean anything. It is how we vote that counts. During the last 2 weeks we have listened to many speeches advocating a balanced budget in principle. But on the first two occasions when a showdown came, the votes were for substantially increased spending and against balancing the budget. The American people are interested in the ultimate result, and not in hearing a lot of political speeches and seeing crocodile tears.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I am happy to see my good friend, the distinguished Senator from Delaware, on the floor. I came in during his comment about the so-called radical spenders in the Democratic ranks. I know he is one of those who are as anxious to balance the budget as I am. He happens to be one of the Members of the Senate who, I believe I am correct in saying, would be glad to see many loopholes in the tax laws closed, which, if done, would result in balancing the budget.

I know that my friend, the Senator from Delaware, has previously indicated his interest in reducing the oil-depletion allowance, and I am sure there are many other tax loopholes which he also would be happy to see closed, so that the budget can be balanced—a goal which I have as much at heart as does he.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. McGEE in the chair). Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. For the last 10 years I have been trying to have the oil-depletion allowance rate lowered, and I appreciate the support of the Senator from Pennsylvania in the attempt to close that tax loophole.

I say in all fairness that we shall not pick up enough to offset the extra money appropriated in the last few days.

Mr. CLARK. But the Senator from Delaware agrees, does he not, that that gap should be closed?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Yes, it should be. I hope the political party which is in control of the Congress will work in that direction, and I hope that enough support can be obtained from this side of the aisle, so that Congress will pass this measure, which in my opinion should have been enacted long ago.

There are many other loopholes which we are trying to close; and I shall certainly join the Senator from Pennsylvania in attempting to do that. I trust that we shall be able to obtain sufficient votes for that purpose. However, let us not kid ourselves. This in itself will not balance the budget.

Mr. CLARK. I thank the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania.

TELEVISION CHANNEL 12, AT WILMINGTON, DEL.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, on February 4, my colleague, Mr. SCOTT, introduced Senate bill 924, cosponsored by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE] and myself, to amend section 307 of the Federal Communications Act by adding the following clause:

> In considering any applications for a license for a television broadcasting station operating in a very high frequency channel in an area where there is no such channel reserved for noncommercial educational use nor any noncommercial educational station operating in any such channel, priority shall be given to any applicants proposing to operate such station for noncommercial educational purposes.

At the time when the bill was introduced, the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR] asked whether the bill would cover the pending applications for channel 12 in Wilmington, Del.; and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] informed him that the bill was broad enough to cover the channel 12 situation. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR] then indicated that he would oppose the bill because it was part of an attempt to shift channel 12 from Wilmington, Del., to the Philadelphia area.

On February 6, 1959, the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WILLIAMS] indicated, by an insertion in the RECORD, that he shared the belief that Philadelphia was trying to obtain that channel.

Mr. President, that simply is not so. There is no attempt on the part of any civic group interested in obtaining educational television to shift channel 12 from Wilmington to Philadelphia, to the best of my knowledge.

The basis for this allegation may be found in the fact that an Atlantic City Broadcasting Co. has requested that channel 12 be shifted to the Atlantic City area, for commercial broadcasting there. The civic groups which are trying to obtain a standard broadcasting band—VHF—for educational television purposes have no interest in moving the channel from the Wilmington area. Most persons who live in the Philadelphia area or in southeastern Pennsylvania can receive channel 12 clearly.

It is a fact, as my colleague stated when he introduced the bill, that in the area south of New York, comprising New Jersey, eastern Pennsylvania, Delaware, and a portion of Maryland, no VHF channel has been assigned for educational television purposes. The assignment of channel 12, in its present location, to an educational television group would be of immense benefit to the estimated six million persons who live within the area which it now covers. I hope our colleagues from Delaware, who, I feel sure, are as interested in educational TV as are the rest of us, will not oppose this worthwhile civic attempt to have channel 12 in Wilmington reserved for educational television purposes, because of fear that there is afoot a move by the educational groups to shift the channel to Philadelphia. No such shift is being sought.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. CLARK. I am happy to yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. I may say to the Senator from Pennsylvania, in commenting on the statement he has just made—and in this respect I believe I can speak also for my colleague [Mr. FREAR]—that we have no objection whatsoever if Pennsylvania wishes to establish a television channel for educational purposes, provided those interested use one of the presently operated channels. Pennsylvania now has 10 or 11 VHF channels; and if Pennsylvania wishes to use 1, 2, or 3 of those channels for educational purposes, that is the business of Pennsylvania, and we would not interfere.

Delaware has only one VHF channel; it is channel 12. This is the only one Delaware has. We will not go along with the support of a bill by the Senators from Pennsylvania which will have the effect of telling Delaware what to do with the only television channel Delaware now has. That channel belongs to Delaware: If we who live in Delaware wish to use that channel for educational purposes, that is our business. But it is not the business of Pennsylvania to tell us what to do with the only television channel assigned to our State. We insist that this channel be allocated to someone who will guarantee to keep its facilities and plan its programs for the benefit of the citizens of our area.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, in reply, let me say very briefly that in southern Pennsylvania we have only three channels, which also serve the State of New Jersey——

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry: Is not the Senate still proceeding in the morning hour, under the 3-minute limitation?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, have I exceeded the 3-minute limitation?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time available to the Senator from Pennsylvania has expired.

TAX-COST SQUEEZE PUTS MANY STATES IN DILEMMA FOR 1959

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, on another subject, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD, in connection with my remarks, an article entitled "Tax-Cost Squeeze Puts Many States in Dilemma for 1959," which was published this morning in the New York Times. The article in terse form states far more clearly than many of us have been able to do in the last few days of debate on the airport bill and the housing bill, the impossibility of expecting the States, particularly the great industrial States, to raise the funds necessary in order to take care of the obsolescence in the public sector of their economy.

I hope this matter will be given careful consideration by all Members of the Senate, because, to my way of thinking, it demonstrates very clearly indeed the reasons why the Federal Government has to make these appropriations in order to take up the slack in the public sector of our economy which the finances of the States do not permit them to provide for.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TAX-COST SQUEEZE PUTS MANY STATES IN DILEMMA FOR 1959—SURVEY FINDS ALBANY IS NOT ALONE IN HAVING PROBLEMS—RECESSION BLAMED—DEFICITS ARE PREVALENT—MICHIGAN CITED AS FACTORY AREA WITH LAG IN INCOME DUE TO UNEMPLOYMENT

(By Russell Porter)

New York is not the only State government that faces the choice between tax increases and reduced spending in 1959.

A nationwide survey by correspondents of the New York Times shows a number of other States to be having similar financial problems in varying degree.

The States are being squeezed between rising costs, particularly in school, road, and welfare programs, and declining tax receipts. In some States budget deficits have occurred or are threatened. The squeeze is particularly evident in big industrial areas most affected by the 1957 recession and continuing unemployment.

Like New York, many States are planning to increase taxes.

RECORD TAX RISE ASKED

Governor Rockefeller has asked the New York Legislature to approve a record rise of $277 million in State taxes for the fiscal year 1959–60.

Under his program the State's personal income tax would be put on a withholding basis and other changes would be made to increase its yield by $150 million a year. The yield on cigarette taxes would be raised by $47 million and on estate taxes by $10 million. His request for a $69,500,000 rise in the gasoline tax had already been granted.

The Governor also proposed the use of $100 million in bond issues and $47 million in reserve funds to help finance a record $2,041 million budget, the first in the State's history to exceed $2 billion.

Spending in the first Rockefeller budget runs $240 million higher than in former Gov. Averell Hariman's last budget, now in effect. About $190 million of the increase is in larger State aid to local governments. The largest single item of increase is $64,500,000 in aid to education.

Following are reports on the financial problems of other representative States:

CALIFORNIA

Gov. Edmund G. Brown submitted last week a 1959–60 budget of $2,100 million. It is designed to meet a deficit he estimates at $68 million inherited from the previous Republican administration, and to balance at a record level.

Mr. Brown, a Democrat, is seeking $256 million in new or increased levies. These include higher income taxes in brackets over $10,000; taxes on cigarettes and tobacco; and higher taxes on beer, horse racing, petroleum products, and corporations.

Many critics want to spend surplus moneys in various State funds before raising taxes. They point to an investment fund of $170 million representing tideland oil royalties, $14 million in the fair and exposition fund, $10 million in a flood control reserve and about $20 million in other surplus or reserve funds.

The State Chamber of Commerce said more taxes would retard the business upswing. It demanded stricter economies and opposed experimental proposals.

COLORADO

Gov. Stephen L. R. McNichols has proposed a $68,800,000 general fund budget for the next fiscal year, about $5,500,000 higher than the current budget.

The Governor has suggested closing of tax "loopholes." He said this could raise $9 million to cover the new funds required and provide added money for needed educational buildings.

Legislators expect proposals for some new taxes, including a cigarette tax, a tax on premiums paid to Colorado-based insurance companies, and a tax on trading stamps. A higher tax on beer is also expected.

Another proposal being considered is to allow the State to take bank accounts and matured insurance policies unclaimed for 7 years.

FLORIDA

Florida's estimated deficit for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1959, is $17,500,000. Agencies and institutions have asked for appropriations totaling increases of $134 million in the next 2 years.

The budget commission has recommended a 2-year spending program of $725 million. This is $4 million less than one revenue estimate, but $9 million more than another.

Gov. LeRoy Collins has said there will be demands for more tax money, but he would recommend economies, including centralized purchasing.

Controller Ray Green has indicated he may suggest broadening the 3-percent sales tax to raise an additional $14 million by removing exemptions on whisky and beer. They are now exempt when sold for consumption off the premises. Others have proposed removal of exemptions on groceries, medicine, and clothing, and an increase in the gasoline tax.

MASSACHUSETTS

The Massachusetts Legislature voted and Gov. Foster Furcolo signed a law last week that authorized a withholding system for collecting personal income taxes.

Thousands who are said to have never filed a State tax return are expected to be uncovered by the withholding system. It is expected to bring in $60 million more in tax receipts this year, of which $12 million will go to State aid for local government.

Governor Furcolo has also proposed a 3-percent sales tax. The budget for the present fiscal year is $405,573,661. An increase of $110 million is expected in the budget for the next fiscal year, beginning in July.

Of the increase, $35 million is to cover an expected deficit in the present budget, $20 million in pay increases for 30,000 State employees, and the rest is for inflationary increases in costs.

MICHIGAN

Industrial Michigan, hard hit by the recession, will end the fiscal year with a deficit of about $110 million.

Gov. G. Mennen Williams has proposed a general purpose budget of $423,900,000, or $44,400,000 more than the current budget. The increase is for higher education, State school aid and civil-service pay increases.

The Governor has asked for $140 million in new revenues to balance the budget and start paying off the deficit. He has called for a 5 percent corporate profits tax (7 percent on financial institutions) to raise $110 million, and a personal income tax with rates from 2 to 6 percent, to produce $100 million.

His program also recommends repeal of the corporate franchise and intangibles tax and a credit of 15 percent of personal property taxes against taxes on business activities and corporate profits.

It suggests a mortgage on the veterans' trust fund to provide $38 million for the University of Michigan, Michigan State University, and the State teachers pension fund.

MINNESOTA

Gov. Orval L. Freeman, Democrat-Farmer-Labor, is expected to introduce this week a tax bill to produce $470 million in the 2 years beginning July 1. This is $83,500,000 more than in the current fiscal biennium and $51 million more than appropriations for the 2-year period ending this June.

He will seek a 1-percent increase in all individual income tax brackets and attempt to introduce a withholding system of collecting income taxes. The three-term Governor is also planning increases in taxes on iron ore, cigarettes, liquor, tobacco, and inheritances and gifts. He would also end the deductibility of Federal taxes for corporate income taxpayers.

The income-tax provisions face a rough time in Minnesota's heavily Conservative senate. Business groups are pressing for a 3-percent sales tax linked with $10 individual credits against income-tax liability. But no Republican or Conservative legislator is taking the initiative on this.

MONTANA

Legislative leaders expect a budget of $78 million for the next 2 years, $14 million more than the present budget. The State now has a $5 million deficit in its general fund.

Numerous tax bills have been introduced in the legislature. Some would provide new taxes, such as taxes on bowling and the sale of soft drinks. Others would raise rates on personal and corporation incomes. Still others would remove exemptions and deductions.

NEBRASKA

Nebraska has a surplus expected to be more than $26 million for the 1957–59 biennial budget, but has a financial problem just the same.

Its problem is to raise $4 million for the next biennium to cover increased funds asked by State-supported educational institutions and other growing needs. State officials are trying to get the money without raising the property tax, which is the only tax Nebraska has for the support of the State government. This tax is now $7.97 a $1,000 of assessed value.

Gov. Ralph G. Brooks has called for stricter enforcement of the existing tax law. He said enough additional property could be put on the tax rolls to raise the $4 million. Others have suggested a tax up to 6 percent on parimutuel horse racing.

OREGON

A surplus estimated at $30 million on June 30, 1959, is expected to be used up in the following 2 years. The proposed budget for the next biennium calls for expenditures of $299 million, or $22 million more than the present budget. Since the new budget was proposed, bills calling for the spending of $29 million more have been introduced in the legislature.

Gov. Mark Hatfield has announced he will present a tax program to the legislature today. He has already proposed broadening the income tax base. Speculation has centered on the possibility of a 1 percent gross income tax, a cigarette tax, a real estate transfer tax, and removal of the personal property credit from the corporation net income tax.

PENNSYLVANIA

The Pennsylvania Legislature faces the prospect of raising $500 million in new taxes to balance the budget for the 1959–61 fiscal biennium beginning in June.

Gov. David L. Lawrence's first budget is expected to approximate $2,500 million. The current budget is $2 billion, and a $100 million deficit is expected by the end of the fiscal period.

The Governor had ordered spending cut to the bone with no vacant jobs to be filled except on his approval. He is awaiting a report from a tax study committee before announcing a tax program.

However a 1-cent increase in the gasoline tax, now 5 cents, is expected. This would yield $31 million additional. And $5 million would come from an expected $1 increase in the cost of an auto license tag or driver's license. A 1-cent increase in the present 5-cents-a-pack tax on cigarettes, and elimination of a number of exemptions in the sales tax are also considered.

Gov. Ralph Herseth has proposed a budget of $63,500,000, which is $8 million higher than any previous budget in the State. Most of the increase is for educational purposes. The increase exceeds by $1 million the $7 million surplus in the State's general fund.

The Governor has recommended increasing the cigarette tax including liquor, hotel and motel bills and various exempted service in the sales tax, and imposing a new bottle cap tax on soft drinks.

TEXAS

Gov. Price Daniel has proposed a tax program to wipe out a deficit of about $65 million in the State operating fund and provide $72,800,000 a year in new revenue.

A decline in oil tax revenues is blamed in large part for the deficit. In addition, the Governor has recommended a new budget that raises total State spending by 17 percent. The 2-year budget calls for $2,311,434,306.

The tax proposals include a new severance beneficiary tax on natural gas at 3 percent of value, revision of the corporation franchise tax formula, increased taxes on motor vehicle sales, liquor and cigars; elimination of exemptions on sales of cigarettes and beer on military reservations, and a tightening of tax collection machinery.

Another proposal calls for the State to take over property unclaimed for 7 years, such as bank deposits, dividends and royalties.

VERMONT

Gov. Robert T. Stafford, a Republican, has proposed a $52,905,000 budget for 1959–60, compared with $56,365,630 for the current financial year. The State faces a deficit estimated at close to $4 million as of June 30.

The incoming administration was pledged to avoid new taxes, but some are recommended in the Governor's proposal. One calls for a 20-percent tax on all other tobacco products to match the existing 20 percent tax on cigarettes. There would also be a 5-percent tax on meals costing more than $1 and on rooms in public lodging places.

The Governor has not called for a sales tax. Its chances of passage had earlier been considered problematical. Vermont already has a graduated income tax that takes 7 percent of net incomes over $5,000.

WASHINGTON

The most controversial tax measure in Gov. Albert D. Rosellini's proposed general fund budget of $835,500,000 is a proposed sales tax on services, from attorneys to shoeshine boys. Opponents say it would overlap the present business and occupation tax of eight-tenths of 1 percent on all gross income over $3,600.

The Governor is also facing rough going on proposals for a State income tax and for a 5 percent tax on the gross of parimutuel betting. He would also raise the present 10 percent tax on hard liquor and beer to 30 percent.

In defending his budget Governor Rosellini said he had trimmed $71,750,000 from the original requests of State agencies but had added $18 million in salary increases. Revenue measures would provide tax increases totaling $135 million.

One of the principal increases would come from an increase in the sales tax to 4 percent from its present 3⅓ percent.

WEST VIRGINIA

The West Virginia Legislature is expected to authorize a budget increase of $18 million to $20 million, including $10 million for roads and the rest for education, mental health and public welfare. The current budget is $118,262,778 for the year ending June 30, 1959.

The State has been hard hit by unemployment, especially in the coal fields. This has resulted in declining tax revenues, particularly from the State sales tax. The Board of Public Works recently cut spending to assure completion of the fiscal year without a deficit.

Tax proposals include raising the gasoline tax from 6 to 7 cents, increasing drivers' license fees from $1 to $5 quadrennially, higher charges for auto and truck license plates, elimination of gasoline tax exemptions to railroads and airlines, a gasoline or diesel fuel tax on interstate truckers, and removal of certain exemptions from the consumers sales tax.

MODERNIZATION OF OUR FEDERAL AIRPORTS

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, last Friday the Senate passed Senate bill 1, to amend the Federal Airport Act.

This action shows clearly that the Senate believes this country means to be a progressive part of the 20th century.

I congratulate the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY], who did the Nation a great service in handling this bill in committee and on the floor with such understanding and ability.

In the framework of this sound legislation and the practical leadership of Senator MONRONEY, the country should fully realize that it cannot afford to do less than to act promptly and effectively toward modernization of our airport facilities.

DESTRUCTION OF AMERICAN TRANSPORT PLANE BY RUSSIAN FIGHTERS

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, my remarks at this time are prompted by an article, written by Roscoe Drummond, which was published this morning in the Washington Post. In the article Mr. Drummond gives a recitation of the chain of events which has developed since the unarmed American transport plane was found charred and destroyed on Russian territory, with the bodies of 6 Americans in the plane, and with 11 of the crew missing.

Last weekend Radio Moscow made a statement alleging that the U.S. Government manufactured a recorded tape which contained an exchange of information and directions had between pilots of Russian planes which shot down the American transport.

I repeat what I said on the floor of the Senate last week dealing with the exchange I had with Mr. Mikoyan while he was at lunch with members of the Foreign Relations Committee. I asked Mr. Mikoyan, "What about the 11 men who were in that plane which the Soviet said it found on Russian territory?" His answer was that they knew nothing about them; they knew that a charred and destroyed plane was found on the territory of the Soviet; that six dead bodies were in it; and it so informed our Government.

I said to him, "There is a mystery attached to the explanation that has been given about the manner and the method in which that plane was found." He said to me, "You obviously do not have any faith in us."

I said, "That is not the issue. There has been no adequate explanation given about what happened and where the other 11 bodies are." He then gave this significant answer: "Hereafter if your Government will notify my Government of the presence of an American plane over our land, the number of persons in the plane, and the purposes of the mission, incidents of this type will not happen."

I submit to my colleagues that that statement, by implication, definitely carries the judgment that there was a relationship between the plane being on Russian territory and the failure of our Government to notify the Soviet. He impliedly stated that, "If you had told us that your plane was over our land, that plane, which contained the six American bodies within it, now would not be on the ground, charred and destroyed."

I submit to my fellow Ohioans back home that a reading of the record of what took place will show these facts:

No. 1, it took 10 days before the Soviet disclosed what they alleged had happened.

No. 2, the Soviets refused to allow American inspectors to examine the remains of the fallen plane.

No. 3, when Menshikov was asked to listen to the recorded tape, he refused to do it, asserting that he did not understand the technicalities of the proposition.

Those three facts definitely point to concealment and to a set of facts which are inconsistent with the explanation given by the Soviet about what happened.

Finally, I say that Mikoyan, by his own statements, implied that the plane did not fall, but that it was brought down by the guns of the Soviet.

It will take more than Radio Moscow, and it will take more than the word of the Soviet and Communist officials, to make the people of the world, the people of the United States, and, finally, the people of Russia themselves, believe that the Communists are telling the truth and that we are telling the falsehood. In my judgment, the people of the Soviet will not believe their own leaders on this subject.

MIKOYAN STOLE UNITED STATES SECRETS

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a column by Victor Riesel entitled "Mikoyan Stole U.S. Secrets," published in the January 12, 1959, edition of the Manchester Union Leader.

Mr. Riesel should be commended for the distinct public service he has performed in documenting, so that all may read it, the espionage activities of Anastas Mikoyan. This is only part of the record, but it is sufficient to enable anyone to realize that a man with such a background as Mikoyan could not change his inner thinking and philosophy to match the sweetness and light exterior he now exhibits. I, for one, am not taken in by it, and I will continue to do my utmost to see that the American people shall be informed of the true character and the true purpose of this man.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MIKOYAN STOLE U.S. SECRETS

Those who are not being beastly to Mikoyan, second in command of the Soviet Union, should know that our intelligence agencies have the visiting tovarish listed as a former chief of economic espionage specializing in the United States.

Bluntly and brutally, the visitor now being feted in our best places was under assignment from Joseph Stalin to steal our basic research and newest industrial secrets in the war's final years. Working under Mikoyan were spy rings about which the public never learned. But from these rings Mikoyan funneled some of the industrial developments which have enabled the Russians to beat us into outer space. Mikoyan was not just another member of the Soviet Union's Politburo making general policy.

The visitor wrote the espionage orders himself. He handed them to secret agents for transmittal to America in Soviet diplomatic pouches.

These were, in turn, handed to Comintern representatives as well as hundreds of lesser Soviet officials in the United States. Some of the orders were passed on to pro-Soviet labor leaders, long since exposed. Those men, Americans and Russians, were working daily right in the innards of our most guarded industries. That was in the days when Mikoyan officially was the Soviet Union's Foreign Trade Minister.

To get some of this pedigree on the man now here for a "soft sell" of the Soviets to the American people, you need not have access to any cloak-and-dagger bureau dossier. You need only find one man, still active in Washington and New York. He is one of Mikoyan's former aides, Victor Kravchenko by name.

Back in the war years, Kravchenko was economic attaché of the U.S.S.R. Purchasing Commission in Washington. But he chose freedom. He broke with the Soviets. Later, in April 1947, he swore under oath publicly to what he had secretly told our counter-intelligence agencies during the intervening years. Kravchenko told the House Un-American Activities Committee:

"One more fact. Mikoyan, this Foreign Trade Minister, sent an order, a very secret order.

"All the responsible, prominent members, the Soviet representatives in the United States (telling them) how to carry on economic espionage and on what special problems in the United States" Kravchenko said, describing the Mikoyan order. "This document was delivered to special secret agents in Washington and, it goes without saying, was delivered, thanks to diplomatic immunity. In the same way secret party orders were delivered to Washington from the central committee of the party.

"I must state in general that no person holding an important position in connection with the economic, political, and military organizations and arriving in the United States from the Soviet Union arrives without a special assignment as to the collection of secret information."

All this is known in detail to the top AFL–CIO leaders at their Washington headquarters. They were, therefore, surprised, chagrined, and some of them bitter and angered when they learned late last Monday evening that James Carey, a member of the AFL–CIO's eight-man executive committee, had invited Mikoyan to a special creamed chicken lunch at his union headquarters.

Some of the labor leaders assumed no undue subtlety in telling this to Carey when he personally telephoned Monday evening and Tuesday morning to ask them to sit with the Soviet official.

Among those who turned Carey down were AFL–CIO president, George Meany, and the machinists' leader, Al Hayes. They said they would not sit with a representative of the nation under whose guns hundreds of working people die each day. There were those who resented this hospitality to Mikoyan because he arrived in the midst of violent anti-semitic and anti-Catholic propaganda campaigns inside the Soviet Union.

Mr. Carey, president of the International Union of Electrical Workers, also attempted to interest Lewellyn Thompson, U.S. Ambassador to Moscow, who now is in Washington. Mr. Thompson said, in effect, "It's all yours, Jim. I wouldn't touch him."

Just what does it take on the Soviets' part for some of our people to treat them as we treated the Nazis—of which they are but a different hue?

CERTIFICATION OF FOOD COLOR ADDITIVES

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, there are two measures on the calendar to which there is no objection. I ask that we now proceed, under the rule, to the consideration of those two measures.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. YOUNG of Ohio in the chair). Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

Is there objection to the present consideration of Calendar No. 47, Senate bill 79?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 79) to amend the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act to permit the temporary listing and certification of Citrus Red No. 2 for coloring mature oranges under tolerances found safe by the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, so as to permit continuance of established coloring practice in the orange industry pending congressional consideration of general legislation for the listing and certification of food color additives under safe tolerances, which had been reported from the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare with amendments on page 1, after the enacting clause, to strike out "That paragraph (c) of section 402 of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act is amended by repealing the second and third provisos to such paragraph, and by inserting before the period at the end of such paragraph a new proviso as follows: 'Provided further,' " and insert "That (a) the second proviso of section 402(c) of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act is amended by striking out 'March 1, 1959,' and inserting in lieu thereof 'May 1, 1959,'."; on page 2, at the beginning of line 6, to insert "(b) The third proviso of section 402(c) of such Act is amended to read as follows: And provided further,"; in line 16, after the word "as", to strike out "packing house elimination" and insert " "packing house elimination" "; at the beginning of line 24, to insert "September 1, 1961, and to"; and on page 3, after line 6, to strike out:

SEC. 2. This act shall take effect upon the date of enactment, except that the repeal of the second proviso of section 402(c) of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act shall not become effective with respect to oranges the skins of which are colored before March 1, 1959, in accordance with such proviso.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) the second proviso of section 402(c) of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act is amended by striking out "March 1, 1959," and inserting in lieu thereof "May 1, 1959,".

(b) The third proviso of section 402(c) of such Act is amended to read as follows: And provided further, That, without regard to the requirements of sections 406(b) and 701(e), the Secretary shall promptly establish, and may from time to time amend, regulations (1) prescribing the conditions (including quantitative tolerance limitations) under which the coal-tar color known as Citrus Red No. 2 (more particularly to be defined in such regulations) may be safely used in coloring the skins of oranges which are not intended or used for processing (or, if so used, are oranges designated in the trade as "packing house elimination"), and which meet minimum maturity standards established by or under the laws of the States in which the oranges are grown, (2) providing for separately listing such color solely for such use on such oranges, and (3) providing for the certification of batches of such color, with or without harmless diluents, for such restricted use; and such oranges, if colored prior to September 1, 1961, and to the enactment by the Congress (subsequent to the date of enactment of this proviso) of general legislation for the listing and certification of food color additives under safe tolerances, in conformity with this proviso and such regulations, with Citrus Red No. 2 from a batch certified in accordance with such regulations, shall not be deemed to be adulterated within the meaning of this paragraph."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, the bill was introduced by the distinguished Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND]; and was considered by the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. The committee had before it the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND]; Mr. Harvey, the Deputy Administrator of the Food and Drug Administration; and Mr. Ellenbogen of that Administration. The Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] and these gentlemen were in full agreement as to the bill and the amendments which the committee reported. The bill has the approval of the Food and Drug Administration; of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare; and of the Bureau of the Budget. I ask that the bill be passed.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I want to express my very great appreciation to the distinguished chairman of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare in regard to this matter. A hearing was held by the full committee, and the bill was unanimously reported. The distinguished Senator has stated accurately that the amendments were discussed and agreed to not only by the sponsor of the measure, the Senator from Florida, but also by the representatives of the Food and Drug Administration and by counsel for that Administration. The bill as amended was also agreed to by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, and representatives of the citrus industry.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Has the bill been discussed with the Republican leadership?

Mr. HOLLAND. The bill has been discussed with the Republican leadership. I personally talked to the distinguished minority leader, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] who, I will say, sat in on the hearings and joined in the unanimous reporting of the bill.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I have no objection.

Mr. HOLLAND. I asked the minority leader this morning if he would consent to having the bill taken up today, and he gave me his assurance that it would be proper and met with his approval.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I have no objection.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that excerpts from the able report of the committee, which clearly set forth the situation, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, to whom was referred the bill (S. 79) to amend the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act to permit the temporary listing and certification of Citrus Red No. 2 for coloring mature oranges under tolerances found safe by the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, so as to permit continuance of established coloring practice in the orange industry pending congressional consideration of general legislation for the listing and certification of food color additives under safe tolerances, having considered the same report favorably thereon, with amendments, and recommend that the bill do pass.

EXPLANATION

The practice of using artificial color to color the skins of fully mature, sound oranges has prevailed in Florida and Texas for many years. Such coloring is necessary because fully mature fruit from those areas in many instances may be greenish and nonuniform in color.

Formerly the coloring material employed was coal-tar color F.D. & C. Red No. 32. Under the provisions of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act this color was certified by the Food and Drug Administration as is authorized by law under provisions that require it to be harmless and suitable for use. In 1955 the Food and Drug Administration developed evidence that F.D. & C. Red No. 32 is not harmless since, under some circumstances and in some quantities, it is capable of causing harm when fed to laboratory animals under properly conducted tests. Because of these findings the Administration caused the color F.D. & C. Red No. 32 to be removed from the list of colors certifiable for use in foods, which had the effect of prohibiting its use for coloring oranges.

In the 84th Congress legislation was passed, Public Law 672, which provided for the temporary continuation of certification and use of the color previously known as F.D. & C. Red No. 32, solely for the purpose of coloring skins of oranges, it having been determined that this would involve no known danger to the public health. This legislation expressly provided an expiration date of February 28, 1959, or sooner if a harmless substitute were developed and listed. It was implicit in the understandings that, during the period thus allowed, every effort would be made by the interested industries to develop a coal-tar color for use on oranges which would meet the criteria of harmlessness and permit its certification under the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act.

The studies undertaken led to the development of the color known as Citrus Red No. 2, which is chemically 1-(2,5-dimethoxyphenylazo)-2 naphthol. The committee has been assured that the toxicity level of Citrus Red No. 2 is significantly lower than that of F.D. & C. Red No. 32.

At feeding levels considerably higher than those required to color oranges, Citrus Red No. 2 can harm test animals; therefore it is not eligible for certification for food use under present law. But in the quantities necessary to color the skin of oranges it is without hazard to man.

In order to provide an available color which will be useful in the coloring of mature oranges upon the expiration of the effective existing law, Public Law 672, this bill provides authorization for the listing and certification under safe tolerances of Citrus Red No. 2 solely for use in coloring mature oranges. It provides that under such qualitative tolerance limitations, and pursuant to regulations to be established by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, each batch of such color employed in the coloring of mature oranges shall be certified. Since it will require a period of approximately 60 days for the color Citrus Red No. 2 to be manufactured, certified, and available to orange packers, the bill further provides that the effective date for the termination of Public Law 672 shall be May 1, 1959. This has the effect of extending the period in which the color formerly known as F.D. & C. Red No. 32 may be employed to color oranges 2 months, and thus allow a period for the new color authorized in this bill to become available under the conditions and restrictions heretofore stated.

The committee has concluded from the evidence presented that enactment of this bill will in no wise be detrimental to the public health or introduce into the food supply an unsafe color. It is further concluded that enactment of this bill will not result in increasing the price of colored oranges to the consumer inasmuch as the competition between colored and uncolored oranges would have the effect of precluding passing on the cost of coloring to the consumer.

The enactment of this bill is entirely consistent with the provisions of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act generally. It is specifically provided that the provisions of this bill will become inoperative on September 1, 1961, or before that time if general legislation affecting coloring materials for food is enacted by the Congress. The reason for the time limit is that this is emergency legislation, which will meet the immediate needs of the citrus industry without permanently engrafting on the basic Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act a new principle of tolerances for coal-tar colors which is not applicable to foods generally. The expiration date has been so fixed as to allow the Congress ample time to consider the application of this principle to all foods.

COMMITTEE AMENDMENTS

The amendments which the committee has made in the bill and which have been approved of by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare are as follows:

1. As introduced, section 1 of the bill would repeal the second proviso to section 402(c) of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act, which had been enacted by Public Law 672, 84th Congress, so as to permit the coloring of the skins of oranges, until March 1, 1959, with the color formerly known as F.D. & C. Red No. 32. Section 2 of the bill is a saving clause to the effect that the repeal of the second proviso of section 402(c) of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act shall not become effective with respect to oranges colored before the March 1, 1959, cutoff date.

The first committee amendment substitutes for this part of section 1 of the bill and for section 2 a provision amending the second proviso of section 402(c) of the act by striking out the cutoff date of "March 1, 1959," and inserting in lieu thereof "May 1, 1959,". The effect of this amendment is to extend the cutoff date for coloring oranges with F.D. & C. Red No. 32 for about 2 months, so as to permit an orderly transition from the use of the color formerly known as F.D. & C. Red No. 32 to Citrus Red No. 2 for coloring the skins of oranges. It will require about 2 months to manufacture and distribute the new color after enactment of the bill.

This committee amendment has been recommended by the sponsor of the bill and by the industry, and the committee has been advised by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare that it has no objection to the amendment.

2. Section 1 of the bill as introduced also would repeal the third proviso to section 402(c) of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act, which now provides that the second proviso, above described, shall have no further effect if prior to March 1, 1959, another coal-tar color suitable for coloring oranges is listed under section 406.

The committee amendment, instead of repealing this proviso, would amend it so as to substitute for its present provisions all of the provisions of the bill relating to the listing and certification of Citrus Red No. 2 for coloring the skins of oranges. This is purely a technical amendment.

3. The third committee amendment would insert on page 2, line 16, of the bill, after the words "prior to", the phrase "September 1, 1961, and to".

The effect of this amendment is to insert a definite time limit, i.e., September 1, 1961, in the bill in addition to the indefinite time limit now specified, so that oranges could be colored with Citrus Red No. 2 under the provisions of the bill only until September 1, 1961, or earlier should the Congress enact general legislation for the listing and certification of food color additives under safe tolerances before that date.

This amendment, suggested by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, makes the measure temporary emergency legislation to be effective for a period which is expected to be adequate for congressional consideration.

DEPARTMENTAL REPORTS

The reports of the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare and the Director of the Bureau of the Budget are as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH,
EDUCATION, AND WELFARE,
January 29, 1959.

Hon. LISTER HILL,
Chairman, Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This letter is in response to your request of January 13, 1959, for a report on S. 79, a bill to amend the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act to permit the temporary listing and certification of Citrus Red No. 2 for coloring mature oranges under tolerances found safe by the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, so as to permit continuance of established coloring practice in the orange industry pending congressional consideration of general legislation for the listing and certification of food color additives under safe tolerances.

As you know, March 1, 1959, is the expiration date of emergency legislation (Public Law 672, 84th Cong.), enacted in 1956, which, notwithstanding the general provisions of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act, permits the temporary continued use, on mature oranges, of a coal-tar color which was formerly on the food color list established under the act but which is now, because of its toxicity, only on the list of colors certified for use in drugs and cosmetics intended for external application to the human body. (The color, formerly known as F.D. & C. Red 32, is now listed as External D. & C. Red 14.) The provisions of Public Law 672, 84th Congress, did not require us to attempt to establish a tolerance limitation to govern the use of that color on oranges during the emergency period, nor would the available data have furnished a scientific basis for the establishment of such a tolerance.

The present bill (S. 79) is designed to permit continuation of the industry's coloring practice for mature oranges (primarily oranges from Florida and Texas), but only with a recently developed substitute coal-tar color, Citrus Red No. 2, and subject to regulations prescribing the conditions, including tolerance limitations, under which the color may be safely used.

For the reasons discussed below, we feel constrained to recommend against enactment of S. 79 in its present form, because the actual terms of the bill, despite the title of the bill, give no real assurance that it would in fact be only temporary emergency legislation pending congressional consideration of general legislation to permit use of toxic food colors under tolerance limitations and other appropriate safeguards. The bill would, however, be acceptable to us if this objection were removed by an appropriate amendment along the lines suggested in this report.

Under the provisions of the present law, a food is deemed to be adulterated if it bears or contains a coal-tar color, unless the color is from a batch certified in accordance with regulations issued under section 406(b) of the act. Section 406(b) permits the listing and certification of coal-tar colors for use in or on food only if the color is "harmless and suitable for use in food." This provision precludes us from listing any color for use in or on food unless the color is harmless substance, i.e., without potentiality of harm when permitted to be used in foods generally without restriction. We have no power to fix tolerances for toxic coal-tar colors so as to permit their safe use in or on food, or to limit the use of coal-tar colors to specified foods, or to a specified manner of application to food. For this reason, and on the basis of this view of the law, we were constrained to "delist" for food use F.D. & C. Red 32, a color which had long been used in coloring a large part of the Florida and Texas mature orange crop and which had theretofore been on the list on the erroneous assumption that the color satisfied the criteria above mentioned. The segment of the orange industry involved, and makers of this color, challenged our interpretation of the law in the courts, but the Supreme Court, on December 15, 1958, sustained the delisting order and our view of the law (Flemming v. Florida Citrus Exchange, 79 Sup. Ct. 160 (decided December 15, 1958)).

The delisting of this color, the only one known at that time to be suitable for the purpose, created an emergency for the segment of the orange industry involved because large quantities of Florida and Texas oranges are green in color when harvested in their mature state, and because such oranges, when not artificially colored, have met strong consumer resistance and the coloring practice had thus become an economic necessity for this part of the industry. In view of these facts and the fact that the evidence so far available did not establish any likelihood of injury from such use of this color, Congress enacted the above-mentioned emergency legislation, with a view to giving the industry a reasonable period of time to make tests and studies necessary to determine the precise toxicity of Red 32 and to develop a harmless substitute if possible. The industry, since then, has developed a proposed substitute coal-tar color, known as Citrus Red No. 2, which, although not a harmless color which could be listed under the present act for use in or on food, has lower toxicity and at the same time greater tinctorial power than Red 32. On the basis of the data furnished us by the industry, we believe that Citrus Red No. 2 is suitable for use in coloring the skins of oranges and that, if authorized, we would be able to establish a safe tolerance for such use.

The question remains whether, in view of these facts, the enactment of the special legislation proposed by S. 79, in its present form, is warranted.

In reporting on July 29, 1958, on S. 3595 (85th Cong.) which proposed permanent legislation to require us to prepare a special list of color additives for use on certain mature oranges (under safe tolerances if necessary), we expressed the view that it "would be unwise and discriminatory to enact permanent legislation of this nature on the basis of a single food commodity to the exclusion of other food products." And we stated that we would therefore be constrained "to recommend that, rather than proceeding with consideration of [such special legislation], the Congress give consideration to legislation dealing with the question of artificial coloring in all foods. The enactment of such broader legislation along sound lines would establish uniform criteria applicable to all foods and would at the same time accomplish the objectives of S. 3595." We included with our report on that bill a copy of our report on H.R. 8945 (a comprehensive color bill) to the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which indicated that we favored the principle of allowing the safe use of added toxic colors in foods, drugs, and cosmetics under proper safeguards, including appropriate tolerance limitations, and subject to properly framed transitional provisions relating to coal-tar colors listed as certifiable at the time of enactment of the amendment. An extra copy of our reports on S. 3595, together with our report on H.R. 8945, is herewith enclosed for your convenience.

We realize that the statutory expiration date of March 1, 1959, fixed for the use of Red 32 by Public Law 672, 84th Congress, foreshadows an emergency for the Florida and Texas growers involved, since Citrus Red No. 2, the substitute color developed by the industry, is not "harmless" and cannot be listed under the present act and since Congress could hardly be expected to enact by that date general legislation to permit the listing and certification of toxic food colors under safe tolerances. We would therefore not object to the enactment of legislation to permit the use of Citrus Red No. 2 under safe tolerances on a temporary emergency basis, i.e., until the adjournment of the first regular session of the next Congress or, if a definite date is desired, until September 1, 1961, thus affording ample time for Congress to consider and enact general legislation on this subject, which, we assume, would supersede the emergency legislation.

Under S. 79, however, the proposed "temporary" legislation would terminate only upon the "enactment by the Congress * * * of general legislation for the listing and certification of food color additives under safe tolerances." This would mean that if, contrary to our hope and expectation, the 86th Congress—and, indeed, future Congresses—should turn down the proposed new principle of establishing tolerances for toxic food colors, the use of Citrus Red No. 2 on oranges under tolerances prescribed by the Secretary would, nevertheless, be permitted, thus converting the so-called temporary legislation into permanent legislation. This could lead to further special statutes engrafting upon the act one special exception after another for this or that food, or this or that color or use of color, and without certain safeguards which, we believe, should be contained in general color legislation.

Thus, S. 79 is subject to the basic objection raised by us in our report of July 29, 1958, on S. 3595, and we are therefore likewise constrained to object to the enactment of S. 79. If, however, the bill were amended along the lines above indicated, the bill would be acceptable to the Department as reasonable emergency legislation. An amendment which would accomplish this would be to amend the phrase "prior to the enactment by the Congress (subsequent to the date of enactment of this proviso) of general legislation for the listing and certification of food color additives under safe tolerances,' " which appears on page 2, lines 16–19, of the bill, by inserting within the parentheses after the word "proviso" the phrase "and prior to September 1, 1961,". Enactment of the bill as so amended, would, we believe, adequately serve the industry's purpose without being open to the objection that it would indefinitely give favored treatment to one industry in resolving a public-health problem in a way which, if valid for one is valid for all.

The Bureau of the Budget advises that it perceives no objection to the submission of this report to your committee.

Sincerely yours,

ARTHUR S. FLEMMING,
Secretary.

EXECUTIVE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
BUREAU OF THE BUDGET,
Washington, D. C., February 2, 1959.

Hon. LISTER HILL,
Chairman, Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This is in reply to your request of January 13, 1959, for the views of the Bureau of the Budget on S. 79, to amend the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act to permit the temporary listing and certification of Citrus Red No. 2 for coloring mature oranges under tolerances found safe by the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, so as to permit continuance of established coloring practice in the orange industry pending congressional consideration of general legislation for the listing and certification of food color additives under safe tolerances.

This bill is designed to permit continuation of the industry's coloring practices for mature oranges, a practice which would otherwise expire on March 1, 1959, under the terms of the existing Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act, as amended by Public Law 672, 84th Congress. Unlike Public Law 672, which authorized the use of Red 32, S. 79 would authorize the use of a substitute coal-tar color, Citrus Red No. 2.

We recommend against enactment of S. 79 in its present form inasmuch as the bill provides for an indefinite rather than temporary extension of the use of coal-tar color practices on mature oranges. We concur with the view presented in the report of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare to the effect that it would be unwise and discriminatory to enact permanent rather than temporary legislation of this nature on the basis of a single food commodity to the exclusion of other food products. We agree with the Department that some kind of time limitation should be included in S. 79 in order to make it clear that the authority for the use of Citrus Red No. 2 would be of a temporary emergency type.

If the bill were amended along the lines indicated above, however, the Bureau of the Budget would have no objection to its enactment.

Sincerely yours,

PHILLIP S. HUGHES,
Assistant Director for Legislative Reference.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I should like to say first that we are quite content, in the orange-growing industries of Florida and Texas, which use the process, to rely upon the administration of the bill by the Food and Drug Administration, which has affirmatively stated not only that it approves the bill but also that it can administer such a law under rules of tolerance which the Department will prescribe in such a way as to continue to well serve the industry and completely protect the consuming public of the Nation.

I will say that the industry has about $200 million a year involved in the sale of the product and depends upon the good will of the consuming public of this Nation. The industry would be the last group in the Nation to want to do anything to undermine the usefulness of the product and its availability to be safely consumed by the public.

I will say, very briefly, that to be qualified for the use of the color-added process our oranges have to be of the premium quality; that is, their content must well exceed the standard of maturity and usefulness required both by the Federal Government and by the State of Florida for the ordinary use of citrus fruit. As a matter of fact, it is in the way of a badge of distinction to be able to carry upon the fruit to words "color added."

Mr. President, we are extremely grateful not only to the committee but to the Senate for allowing this quick handling and passage of the bill, because we are working against a deadline. The present law expires on February 28, so Senators will realize prompt handling and approval of the bill are required under the circumstances.

I again thank my distinguished friend, the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, I desire to commend the distinguished senior Senator from Florida for his able handling of the bill. It was my privilege to be on the committee which heard the bill. The bill passed the committee unanimously, after the Senator's presentation.

I represent an area which produces some oranges and citrus fruit, but unfortunately no real percentage as compared to the great production of the great State of Florida. We join in this request that the Senate pass the bill to give this opportunity to the growers of our citrus fruit.

The citrus industry is a great industry in this country. The quantity of land available for citrus fruit is constantly shrinking, due to the cutting up of the orange groves in southern California and the sale of those orange groves for residence lots. That is curtailing the acreage which is available for citrus fruit production in the United States, so it becomes increasingly important that great care be given to this phase of our domestic agricultural production. This is a part of our agriculture which is not in a distressed state. This part pays its own way and makes money. It is becoming increasingly prosperous.

Passage of the bill now before the Senate will help expedite the marketing of the crop which is to come from the trees. I again commend the distinguished senior Senator from Florida for his able, expeditious, and knowledgeable handling of the bill. The Senator knows the subject more thoroughly than any other man I know in a legislative body anywhere, and has presented it extremely well before the committee.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I certainly thank my distinguished friend, the Senator from Texas. While our great neighboring State of Texas may produce fewer oranges than we produce, surely I would not lay claim to the fact that our oranges are any better than their oranges, which are certainly good, palatable, and delightful to consume. I hope the State of Texas may reach the day when the industry will be larger, because I am sure it will be of increasing profit to the State of Texas and to the Nation for that to be the case.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, modesty forbade me from telling how good are the Texas grapefruit. No one can challenge their superiority on the market, I will say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further amendments to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BEST WISHES OF CONGRESS TO THE AMERICAN DENTAL ASSOCIATION

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next measure on the calendar.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 7) extending best wishes of Congress to the American Dental Association on the centennial of its founding.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, this resolution has been cleared with both the majority leadership and the minority leadership. The resolution is sponsored by some 80 Members of the Senate. The resolution extends best wishes of the Congress to the American Dental Association on the centennial of the founding of that association.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the concurrent resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at this point in the RECORD the statement made by me in reporting the resolution from the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare to the Senate be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Committee on Labor and Public Welfare on many occasions has had representatives of the American Dental Association appear before it in connection with legislation concerned with health matters. The committee has invariably found the representatives of the association to be most cooperative and exceedingly helpful in aiding the committee in its efforts to see to it that such legislation would be so designed as to best advance the health of our Nation. Members of the committee are also well aware of the selflessness and devotion with which the American Dental Association has repeatedly sponsored programs which have contributed greatly to the dental health of the people of America and, indeed, of peoples throughout the world. In consequence, the members of the committee are unanimous in believing that the tribute which the Congress would pay the American Dental Association through the passage of this resolution is richly deserved.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

The resolution (S. Con. Res. 7) was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the felicitations and best wishes of the Congress of the United States are hereby cordially extended to the American Dental Association on its many and varied contributions to the health of the people and upon the occasion of the one hundredth anniversary of the founding of the association.

The preamble was agreed to.

WATERSHED MANAGEMENT RESEARCH IN OREGON

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, on February 6 I received a letter from Mr. Arthur K. Roberts, secretary, Oregon division of the Izaak Walton League of America, Inc., containing as an attachment a resolution adopted by the Oregon division at its State convention last November.

Because of the public service which this organization has rendered over the years to the cause of sound water, timber, and game management, I feel that the Senate should have the views of the Oregon division placed before it. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution to which I have made reference be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PROPOSED RESOLUTION FOR WATERSHED MANAGEMENT RESEARCH IN OREGON

Whereas our national progress and economic security are vitally dependent upon adequate supplies of usable water; and

Whereas wise use of water-source areas is dependent upon principles of watershed management involving integration of water production with recreational uses; growing and harvesting of timber; and grazing of domestic stock and game animals; and

Whereas deteriorating watershed conditions in the State of Oregon have led to many forms of damage to economic and esthetic values, including flooding, sedimentation of stream channels, and destruction of fish habitat; and

Whereas techniques of sound watershed management have not been developed because of insufficient research, particularly in the Pacific Northwest: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Oregon division of the Izaak Walton League: (a) Promote an expanded program of research on forest and range watershed lands; and (b) advise members of Oregon's congressional delegation of the need for these investigations and encourage support of increased funds for upstream watershed research by the Forest Service in Oregon; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the Secretary of Agriculture, the Chief of the U.S. Forest Service, chairman of the Subcommittee on Interior and Related Agencies of the House Committee on Appropriations, and to Members of the Oregon congressional delegation.

BALANCED BUDGETS

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, we heard considerable discussion in the Senate this morning from both sides of the aisle about balancing the budget. With that general proposition I think there is more or less agreement among us, if we could first agree on what budget we are talking about.

It has been very interesting to note that in much of the discussion the proponents of a balanced budget forget to tell the American people that before we talk about balancing it, we ought to have a sound bookkeeping budget, called by the budgeteer experts a capital budget, the type of budget for which the Senator from Oregon has been pleading on the floor of the Senate, as the spokesman of many great industrialists in America, great business leaders, since 1947.

I have been their spokesman since 1947, because I have been pleading for the adoption of the budget report for 1947 of the Committee for Economic Development, a committee composed of great industrial leaders, a committee on which there is not a single governmental official. Since 1947, those leaders of American business represented on the Committee for Economic Development have been telling us, in effect, that we really are misleading the American people on the entire question of balancing the budget—and truly we are—because we do not get the information out to the American people, first, that the budget which is sought to be balanced is a type of budget under which no American corporation would think of operating an American business.

In the present Federal budget, there are lumped or merged together the operating costs, the administrative costs of our Government, and all the capital investments that Uncle Sam owns, including investments which are self-liquidating and wealth-producing. It is said, for example, that we should include in balancing the budget expenditures for Grand Coulee or Bonneville Dam, and the other great wealth-producing capital investments of the country.

CAPITAL BUDGET WOULD ENABLE EVALUATION OF EXPENDITURES

If we should ever adopt what some of us have been pleading for in the Senate, namely, a capital budget, a sound bookkeeping budget, the politicians, of course, would lose much of the basis for demagogic appeals to the fears of the American people. There would not be as much political propaganda with which to scare the American people into thinking that Uncle Sam is about to lose his shirt, and that he is ready for the poorhouse. They would recognize the great fiscal soundness of Uncle Sam, and the fact that our governmental wealth has been going forward by leaps and bounds.

If we look at the capital investments, the capital wealth, of Uncle Sam, we find that his wealth has been increasing at such a rapid rate over the years that I do not become alarmed when I listen to politicians talk about a balanced budget. I am perfectly willing to go along with a program which seeks to eliminate great waste from governmental expenditures; but this is one United States Senator who is not frightened by an unbalanced budget, if that budget bears a sound relationship to the wealth of the United States, and calls for further investments on the part of Uncle Sam which will turn into the Treasury of the United States income from great wealth-producing projects which we should be developing, but which we are not developing at the present time. There seems to be a great tendency in this Congress to soft-pedal them, because the politics of the moment seem to be the politics of a balanced budget.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I commend the Senator from Oregon for the statement he has made about the necessity of keeping a capital budget for the U.S. Government. I invite his attention to the fact that there is not a single first-class city in America today which does not conduct its finances by having a separation of the capital budget and the operating budget. There has been a tendency to sneer a little at the governments of our cities in America. I think the sneering has been quite unjustified. If the Government of the United States were to take a leaf from the book of some of our better governed cities and create a sound capital budget system, I think we would all be better off.

I thank my friend for his very pertinent remarks on the subject.

Mr. MORSE. The Senator from Pennsylvania is quite correct. I appreciate his comments.

The Committee on Economic Development has been pointing out the situation to us for years. What worries me is that the American people are greatly concerned about the security of their Nation. The greatest defense weapon the United States has is our economy and its potentialities.

I do not intend to sit at this desk and go along with one Dwight D. Eisenhower in the kind of budget he is presenting to the Congress this year, under the political "hokum" that he is presenting a balanced budget, when he is cheating future generations of American boys and girls out of the heritage to which they are entitled in the development of the resources of the country for an expanded economy, so that America can fulfill her destiny.

As this Congress proceeds, I shall speak on this subject at some length. In this Congress I will dedicate myself, so far as the budget is concerned, to a demonstration of the shortsightedness of the President of the United States in regard to the matter of developing the resources of America so that the United States can become stronger and more secure.

I shall pinpoint the demonstration with recommendation after recommendation in the President's budget—for example, a proposal to recommend not one red cent for proceeding with the construction of Green Peter Dam in my State. I mention that project merely because I know all the facts about it, but there are developments in other States that are equally deserving.

Millions of dollars' worth of the topsoil belonging to future generations of American boys and girls is being washed away because of the shortsightedness of our generation. We should be following a conservation program essential to protecting the source of a future food supply for generations of American boys and girls yet unborn. The food experts testifying before us these days are concerned over the question as to where the boys and girls of the year 2000 in the United States are going to get enough food on which to survive.

The difference between politics and statesmanship impresses itself upon me more and more, year by year, as I serve in the Senate. How could a President of the United States bring forward a budget which fails to take into account the matter of capital investment; which fails to recognize that when we invest in a project such as Green Peter Dam, which will provide flood control in the Willamette Valley of my State, for example, and save the rich topsoil which, once washed away, is gone for all time, we are making a great capital investment; which fails to recommend a single cent for capital investment in a greatly needed dam to give us the hydroelectric power essential in order to expand the economy and create the wealth from which new tax dollars will flow into the Treasury of the United States and repay its cost time and time again? I am at a loss to understand even the politics of such a short-sighted policy, although I have long since ceased to expect any statesmanship from the White House.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I shall be glad to yield in a moment. We have a proposal in the budget of only $20 million, to proceed on the John Day Dam, which is under construction. The construction companies are there. Anyone who knows anything at all about the construction business knows that there is no economy in starting and stopping, starting and stopping. When we start a great construction project, economy dictates that we drive through as rapidly as possible until the project is finished; then we start to collect the income from the wealth which is produced by the project.

The Corps of Army Engineers have told the Oregon delegation this year that they could spend $40 million during the next year, and could spend the money efficiently and effectively. Yet the President, under the plausible label of a balanced budget, recommends only $20 million.

I wonder if he knows the difference between a capital budget and a budget that mixes together capital investment and operating administrative costs of the Government. Someone must be willing to stand up and lead with his chin, as we say in politics, and point out to the American people: "You are being taken for a ride by the Eisenhower administration in connection with the so-called balanced budget political propaganda that they are feeding you."

The administration took such a whipping in 1958 that now, in desperation, they are trying to convince the American people that they are in for fiscal trouble if we do not stop the development of these capital investments, which are so essential to keep this Nation of ours secure. I now yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I should like to congratulate the Senator from Oregon on this extremely important point. It is difficult to estimate how much the country has suffered and is continuing to suffer and will suffer in the future because of the absence of a capital budget.

I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Oregon to tell the Senate what would happen to any corporation which failed to use that concept in its accounting procedure, by failing to distinguish between capital investment and operating expenses.

Mr. MORSE. Once the stockholders got word of it and started to take into account their losses, they would get a new board of directors.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Exactly.

Mr. MORSE. Of course I have been suggesting that we need a new national board of directors.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I have been making the same suggestion, of course.

I have had some experience with a small corporation that I headed. It is a growing corporation, because we have made the right kind of investments to help us grow. The only way that a business can expand and do so effectively is by recognizing its duty, if it has the opportunity, to invest in capital resources, when such investments seem most likely to earn a profit. In our private enterprise system a private company must invest if it is to compete. And it must either compete or die.

I should like to suggest to the distinguished Senator from Oregon that our country's economy is in very serious competition with the Soviet Union. It is enormously important that we make the right kind of capital investments. It is no accident that the Soviet economy is growing very rapidly and that our economy is not growing as rapidly as some Americans and some Senators believe it should. One of the reasons for it is that whenever a proposal for investment is made, either in the Senate or in the House, an investment which will pay off in future years, it is classified as an expenditure—as spending—as a subtraction from the budget.

I should like to point out also, that we have a tax structure in this country, administrated by the Internal Revenue Service, which makes it very clear that every taxpayer must distinguish between the investments he makes and the expenditures he makes. Anyone who thinks that is not the case, should try to charge off as a tax expense the investments he makes in capital equipment. The Internal Revenue Service will bring him to court—and rightly so—if he tries to do that.

If that is proper and legal procedure for a private business and for private enterprise, it should likewise be the proper procedure for a Government enterprise.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin is indisputably right. I appreciate his support. As the Senator knows, last year I introduced a capital budget bill. The same kind of bill is now being perfected again, and I shall have it ready for introduction within the next few weeks. I hope that this year we not only can have hearings held on this proposal, but that we can get a bill reported by the committee and can take it up on the floor of the Senate for action.

Such a proposal was proposed by the first Hoover Commission as one of its principal recommendations. So far as I know, almost every economic group which has conducted any studies in regard to the fiscal problems of our country has ended up with a recommendation for a capital budget. I certainly hope we can proceed to get such a budget adopted.

The Senator from Wisconsin pointed out the competition we are in with the Soviet Union. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] was one of the first, in one of his early reports on his travels in Russia, to warn us of the great competition we face from Russia in so-called heavy industry. He pointed out to us, in one of his early reports, that Russia was well on its way toward the completion of 3 or 4 hydroelectric dams, each one of which is at least twice as large and several of which are larger than the largest dam we have ever built in the United States.

Mr. President, there is no combination of American industry which can build such dams. These are multipurpose dams. They are dams which go to navigation benefits, to flood control, irrigation, and recreation in addition to power. That kind of capital investment always will have to be built by the Government. We can work out an arrangement with private industry for the use of the facilities of such projects in the interest of the people of this country.

What concerns me is that we have such a timid administration in regard to such matters as this. I am mentioning this subject this morning because I believe it is a very fit introduction to some comments I wish to make about the book written by Drew Pearson and Jack Anderson, recently off the press, called "U.S.A.—Second Class Power?"

I spent a part of the weekend reading this book, as sometime before I had read another book, written by another columnist, Marquis Childs, published last August and entitled "Eisenhower, Captive Hero."

These two books are very remarkable for many reasons. One of the reasons that they are remarkable is that we are beginning now, at long last, to find some courageous men in American journalism who are lifting the veil on the Eisenhower administration. We are beginning now to get the record which some of us for some years have warned the American people was the record which would have to be written of this administration when the final appraisal of the sorry record of failure in this critical period becomes the judgment of history.

The interesting thing is that when there is published such a book as Marquis Childs' "Eisenhower, Captive Hero," setting forth in cold print for history to read what many of us from the beginning knew were the shortcomings of this administration, it is treated pretty much by the tactic known as "thunders of silence."

Some attention was paid the Childs book, but not nearly enough. Now we have the Pearson-Anderson book dealing with this all-important question of the security of America under the interesting title: "U.S.A.—Second Class Power?"

There are certain pages of the book I shall refer to in a moment, because it is a thought-provoking and disturbing book. As one reads the book, one is inclined to say to himself, as I did, "Pearson and Anderson, I certainly hope you are dead wrong."

In my judgment, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, there are certain charges, arguments, allegations, and presentations of information between the covers of the book which the Committee on Foreign Relations had better look into, because if they can be substantiated the American people had better be apprised before it is too late.

Before I discuss any of the contents of the book, I wish to make a comment on my impressions and reactions following a series of briefings to which I have listened as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations since this session of Congress convened. The first one was of some 2 hours' duration, and was by the Secretary of Defense and the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. The second was by General White, of the Air Force, and General Taylor, of the Army. The briefings dealt with the question of our Nation's security and destiny. Much of it was top secret, even though a great part of it had appeared from time to time in the press before we were even briefed. Nevertheless, I shall not be a party to disclosing what we were told in those briefings.

But I want the record to show my impression and my forewarnings. When we were finished with the second briefing, I had listened to all the testimony about whether we were ahead on this or Russia was ahead on that, whether our overall defenses were adequate to maintain the deterrent strength that we must have if there is any hope for us to work out of the morass in which mankind finds itself—and let me make it perfectly clear, as I did in the committee in colloquy with those heads of our Defense Establishment:

"Show me a need for an appropriation for any program which is essential for deterrent strength, and you have my vote."

I have been a Member of the Senate going on 15 years. I know the repetitive pattern of the Pentagon Building. One can almost chart it. Just before the debate on every appropriation bill starts, or in preparation for a debate on an appropriation bill, we get scare arguments out of the Pentagon Building that the country is just about to collapse if we do not proceed to appropriate billions of dollars more. I will vote for the billions if I can be shown the need; but I should like to have someone come from the Pentagon Building sometime and give us some testimony as to the hundreds of millions of dollars which they have saved and which they can save in eliminating obsolescence in the Military Establishment; in eliminating inexcusable waste in the Military Establishment; and bringing to an end the need for the hundreds of millions of dollars which the experts who have studied American military foreign aid have shown to the Committee on Foreign Relations can be saved. I should like to have some testimony, once, that the Pentagon has given a little thought to the American taxpayer by way of eliminating some waste, because that, too, would make our country more secure.

When we are presented with the findings of the Comptroller General on this subject, and when the Senate spends more than $240,000, as we did about 3 years ago, for contracts entered into with great research institutions such as the University of Chicago, the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Columbia University, the Brookings Institution, and two or three other private research institutes, to give us a study of the workings of American military and economic foreign aid, and they return with a series of findings which show the wastes, I happen to think that the Pentagon Building has an obligation to do something to bring about the saving.

So again this year I shall offer the amendments which seek to implement the findings of the experts in this field, and I shall raise the question with the Pentagon officials: "What do you propose to do about it?"

Mr. McNAMARA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. McNAMARA. The Senator from Oregon referred to the book "U.S.A.—Second Class Power?" The book contains a chapter entitled "Profits Versus Patriotism." It deals with scores of corporations who are charged by name, not by insinuation, with questionable practices. It is particularly pointed out in the book that many retired generals and admirals have been hired, who seem to have no qualifications for the jobs for which they are hired except that they have contacts with the Pentagon.

Mr. MORSE. I was about to comment on that subject specifically. That part of the book deals with the subject "Profits Versus Patriotism." It is a very shocking chapter to read. The Committee on Foreign Relations and the Committee on Armed Services owe it to the American people to look into the charges.

If the charges cannot be substantiated, then the American people ought to know it. But if they can be substantiated—and let me say the authors go a long way to make a prima facie case in the book—then it is about time the Pentagon, the White House, and Congress did something about it. I shall have more to say about this problem later.

Mr. McNAMARA. I do not want to anticipate the Senator's remarks, but I am particularly impressed with one particular chapter. In connection with questionable practices, it seems, according to the book, that some corporations are accused of going so far as to sell plans of our planes and submarines to foreign powers. The book mentions the prices paid for the plans. This is going pretty far. The contractors are still continuing to get the major portion of the contracts which the Pentagon has been letting.

I think, speaking generally, that the book sums up the matter in such a way as to indicate that there is a failure to use well-established business practices. This is a pretty serious charge. It is bad enough that this has been happening in past years, but the book concludes in this chapter with the statement that these practices are now being carried over by some companies into our missile program, for which we are now spending billions of dollars.

It seems to me these are serious charges. As the Senator has said, in many cases they have been well documented. If the Pentagon does not answer these charges, if the Pentagon does not make some response, inasmuch as the book has been mentioned here on the floor by several Senators, it seems to me that it will be up to the congressional committees to go into this matter and determine the facts, because these are serious charges of waste of the money of the taxpayers.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I completely agree with the Senator from Michigan. In a moment, after I have yielded to the Senator from Missouri, I shall comment in greater detail on this matter.

At this time let me say that I agree with the Senator from Michigan that the charges should be answered. They should not be met, as in the past, with the thunders of silence which have typified the attitude of so much of the press in the case of the Eisenhower administration ever since it has been in office, and which have led me to say that in many cases the American press has done a better "snow" job for the Eisenhower administration than Pravda has done for Khrushchev.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President——

Mr. MORSE. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SYMINGTON. I thank the Senator from Oregon for yielding to me. His courtesies to me here remind me of the courtesies he invariably extended to me some years ago when he was a very able and hard-working member of the Armed Services Committee, and I was with the Air Force.

Mr. MORSE. Let me say that at that time—as now—we always obtained from my friend facts, not propaganda.

Mr. SYMINGTON. I thank the able Senator from Oregon.

I have read "U.S.A.—Second Class Power?" It is worth the reading of anyone interested in our national defense.

Today, in this country—thanks to such patriotic citizens as the distinguished senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] and the able Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK] the people of the United States are more interested in just where we stand in our defenses, as against that of the possible enemy.

After reading the book—which I did with great interest—I am sure anyone interested in the subject of defense can find some of the answers. I congratulate the authors of the book on the effort they have made to ascertain facts in the defense field.

Mr. President, I also thank my good friend, the Senator from Oregon, for yielding to me, inasmuch as it is necessary that at this time I leave the floor.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I am glad to have that contribution by the Senator from Missouri, because so many parts of the book supply support for the work done here on the floor of the Senate by the Senator from Missouri during the past several years when he has been trying to warn the American people that the Eisenhower administration has not been giving our country the military protection it must have in order to keep the country secure from the standpoint of deterrent strength. The Senator from Missouri knows the high regard I have for him because of the statesmanship he has demonstrated—sometimes when he was almost alone, here on the floor of the Senate—in crossing swords with the President of the United States, when the Senator from Missouri charged that either the President was uninformed in regard to the plight in which our country found itself from the standpoint of air support, or the President was willing to take a calculated risk.

Mr. President, we have no time, in my judgment, to justify the taking of a calculated risk, so far as the security of our Nation is concerned. In my judgment, the Senator from Missouri stands out as the leader in the United States today, who has dared stand up on the floor of the Senate, during the past several years, and to raise questions regarding the fallibility of the occupant of the White House in the military field.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, I am very grateful to my friend from Oregon for those undeserved but deeply appreciated comments.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Moss in the chair). Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Oregon and the equally distinguished Senator from Missouri are, respectively, members of the Foreign Relations Committee and the Armed Services Committee of this body. I have been looking at the book entitled "U.S.A.—Second-Class Power?" with great interest, too. I wonder whether my two colleagues will agree with the one-paragraph summary of the condition which confronts us with respect to our national security and foreign policy which I now read from page 329 of the book:

> Any cold analysis of the American position in the world today must reach the unpleasant conclusion that we have three alternatives. We can precipitate a preventive war, and hope to win it. We can reconcile ourselves to becoming definitely and permanently a second-class power. Or we can tighten our belts for a long and self-sacrificing attempt to prove that capitalism is better than communism, that our science can be better than Communist science, our education better than Communist education, our dedication more determined than that of the Soviet Union.
> We don't believe the American people will long hesitate in making this choice.

Then the authors of the book state that they believe the American people will choose the third alternative.

I wonder whether the Senate will agree with that statement.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield once more?

Mr. MORSE. I am happy to yield.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Let me say that perhaps I disagree with part of that statement as read by the able Senator, because I do not think the possible enemy would long let our country be a second-class power.

Rather we would be either a fourth-class or fifth-class power, or whatever word would properly classify a Communist satellite. I do not think we would have the choice of being a second-class power at all. In view of the developments of today, I think we are now faced with the problem of survival.

In that connection, recent testimony before our committee by Dr. von Braun and others is interesting.

Again, may I point out that much constructive information regarding our national defense is contained in the book in question.

I thank the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, my comment on what the Senator from Pennsylvania has said is that I have no doubt as to what will be the decision of the American people on this or any other great emergency problem, once they understand the facts. What I protest so much is the frightening turn in America toward government by secrecy, in that the people are not given the facts, and are not in the position to evaluate American foreign policy, because they do not know what it is; they are not in a position to evaluate America's defense posture, because they do not know what it is—although when we asked one of the witnesses who was before us, the other day, "Have you told us anything which in your opinion the Russian leaders do not already know?" we obtained from him the admission that probably they already know everything he had told us. But the people of this country do not know that much.

Of course we cannot always be sure, and I do not favor making secrets available to the Russians. But, Mr. President, the American people are entitled to know a great deal more than they are being told, so they can develop their own foreign policy. Under our Constitution, foreign policy belongs to the people of this country, not to the President of the United States and the Secretary of State. A great fallacy, which is referred to in debate in this Chamber a great deal of the time, is that the President and the Secretary of State develop our foreign policy. Of course that is entirely incorrect; and, if carried to its logical conclusion, the President and the Secretary of State would be the dictators of American foreign policy. Of course that is pure nonsense.

They are the administrators of a foreign policy to be developed under the advice and consent clause of the Constitution of the United States, by means of which, under our system of checks and balances, the legislative representatives of the people check a President and a Secretary of State in the development of foreign policy. But the people cannot do that unless they know much more about our foreign policy than they do now.

So I think the information which is being made available by means of the book—again, subject to check—is a great service to the people of America; and I think we must investigate these allegations, we must determine what is factual, and must proceed from there.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, at this point will the Senator from Oregon yield again to me?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to make two brief observations: First, I am in accord with the Senator from Oregon that there is a conspicuous lack of leadership in telling the American people the truth about the deadly peril in which we live. Second, my own strong conviction is that we cannot measure up to this challenge unless we get more revenues for the Federal Government and, in my judgment, in order to do that and still balance the budget, we need to start to close the unjust and inequitable tax loopholes. Closing these loopholes would enable us to balance the budget and still provide for the cost of our national security and the money necessary to take care of the obsolescence in the public sector of our economy.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, as the Senator from Pennsylvania knows, I am a soldier in the ranks in that battle, and I am quite prepared to join him in that fight to close up the tax loopholes.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President——

Mr. MORSE. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I have read in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD some critical comments about this book, "U.S.A.—Second Class Power?" by Drew Pearson and Jack Anderson. The criticism was that the book, in part, engages in criticism in terms of President Eisenhower's painting and recreation. I agree that the burden and theme of the book is so enormously important that it might be better that the book should be concerned with the effectiveness or ineffectiveness or our military policies exclusively. In fact it does so almost exclusively. And it does an extremely useful job.

I should like to cite one specific instance of a serious allegation that I think has been documented and which I think the Congress of the United States should investigate. It occurs in chapter V, which is entitled "Slum in the Sun." It relates to the situation at Cape Canaveral in Florida. Very serious questions are raised about the efficiency and management of the vitally critical installation there, particularly the basis on which management of that installation was transferred from the Air Force to Pan American.

According to the authors, the Air Force officer who was principally responsible for the contract which made Pan American responsible for management, later turned up, very shortly after this occurred, in a highly paid position with Pan American.

In view of the very serious questions which have been raised as to the efficiency of the installation at Cape Canaveral, it seems to me this incident alone warrants very careful scrutiny by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the disclosures about this matter be printed in full at this point in the RECORD. The account appears on pages 45, 46, 47, 48, and through the first full paragraph on page 49 of the book.

There being no objection, the extracts were ordered to be printed, as follows:

SLUM IN THE SUN

On July 8, 1947, a decision was taken that was to transform a scrubby, mosquito-infested sandbar, jutting out into the Atlantic from Florida's sunny east coast, into the most crucial installation in our defense complex. The name of that sandbar is Cape Canaveral, starting point of the missile test range that stretches 5,000 miles to a bleak, volcanic island called Ascension, deep in the South Atlantic.

What goes on at Canaveral, known less formally as the Cape, is vital to the free world. Upon the success of the missiles tested there, upon the efficiency of its operations, largely depends the answer to that terrifying question: Can the United States catch up with Russia in the race to dominate outer space? All our strategic missiles, from the ocean-leaping Atlas to the under-ocean-launched Polaris, must pass through the Cape. Every hour squandered there represents an equivalent gain for Russia—a gift of time on a platter of dollars.

At first the range was operated by all three Armed Forces, an arrangement bedeviled by interservice rivalry. But on May 15, 1950, the Air Force took charge of the nest and began adding island bases to test and track missiles in flight. To patrol the watery space between the islands, a fleet of white picket ships was acquired. A dozen electronic outposts, backstopped by as many floating stations, trace the great metal birds during their supersonic migrations from the Cape.

Suddenly in 1953, just as the Air Force had settled down to a highly efficient operation of this all-important testing ground, its management quietly passed to a private contractor, as curious a cuckoo as ever invaded any nest: Pan American Airways.

Immediately Pan American began recruiting missile managers on a jobs-for-buddies basis, hiring former pilots, mechanics, ticket agents, and baggage handlers. Its motives weren't alone patriotic. The contractor was paid a fixed fee as its profit for managing the base, and this fee quickly jumped to a million dollars a year. The company also foresaw a commercial future in the missile business. "Indeed," its literature happily boasts, "when guided missiles open the way for space travel, Pan Am's Guided Missile Range may emerge as the pioneer of commercial space-lines."

Pan Am advertises that it is "the world's most experienced airline," and beyond any question it is second to none in its champagne-and-orchids service to travelers. But whether it should be allowed to cut its space-age teeth on so critical a project as the missile-launching base from which we must compete with Russia is another matter. The record so far revealed shows that Pan American Airways and the operation of Cape Canaveral must accept some responsibility for America's drastic drop in power.

The Air Force justified the Pan Am contract in a confidential memo, composed by Lt. Gen. Orval Cook and dated October 26, 1953: "The Air Staff favors contractor operation at the Air Force Missile Test Center because of the conviction that a more efficient and effective operation will result. (Private) contractors are able to obtain better quality and stability of personnel than the Air Force. * * * They do not depend on proselyted Air Force personnel to fulfill their requirements." Cook added another ominous argument: "Ineptness or inefficiency in testing could have dire consequences not only from the cost standpoint, but also in the effectiveness of the weapons as finally adopted."

The warning was sadly prophetic. After the Soviet sputniks had humbled American pride almost to the panic point, one of the authors investigated conditions at the Cape. Unhappily, Pan Am's rule of the range has not fulfilled Air Force hopes. Its management has been plagued with the very ineptness and inefficiency the Air Force was trying to avoid. Its motley staff does not qualify as better personnel. The turnover rate, exceeding 50 percent a year, is far worse than the Air Force average, far worse also than that of the average industrial plant. It does not provide better stability of personnel.

Pan Am may not have been proselyting Air Force personnel, but it has ended up with a startling number of retired colonels and generals. These pastured officers, who enjoy the Florida sunshine and the opportunity to supplement their pensions with Pan Am paychecks, got their jobs through Pentagon cronies whom the company wanted to please. This nepotism has reached such proportions and produced such inefficiencies that even Pan Am is worried.

How did a commercial airline, whose only claim to missile know-how is the coincidence that both airplanes and missiles fly, end up operating the free world's most important missile center? The evidence indicates that an important factor was reward for a worthy Republican contractor.

The Secretary of the Air Force who turned the missile range over to Pan American Airways was the late Harold E. Talbott, one of the most likable rough-and-tumble businessmen ever to serve in the Pentagon, but also one of the worst misfits. He owed his appointment under Eisenhower to the fact that he was one of the most indefatigable money-raisers for the Republican Party, just as Louis Johnson owed his appointment as Secretary of Defense under Truman to the fact that he was an ardent money-raiser for the Democratic Party.

Talbott had been eastern chairman of the Republican finance committee in 1934 at about the same time another young money raiser, Samuel F. Pryor, of Connecticut, later a top executive for Pan American Airways, was emerging in Republican ranks. Pryor was eastern treasurer of the Republican National Committee from 1936 to 1938, then became Republican National Committeeman from Connecticut and manager of Wendell Willkie's eastern campaign headquarters. Harold Talbott served as chairman of the Metropolitan New York GOP Finance Committee and then became chairman of the overall Republican National Finance Committee for the 1948 campaign that almost elected Tom Dewey, but didn't. It was a terrible blow to Talbott. He had been promised the job of Ambassador to the Court of St. James', and his daughters had all but picked their court dresses.

During these years, both Talbott and Pryor helped raise thousands of dollars for the Grand Old Party and, like all political money raisers, believed that to the victor belongs the spoils. One of the most lucrative spoils was defense contracts, and Talbott did not hesitate to try to cancel an aluminum-extrusion-press contract with Kaiser Aluminum at Halethorpe, Md., in favor of the Harvey Aluminum Co., which had contributed handsomely to the Republicans. He did not hesitate to cancel the military-plane contract with Kaiser in favor of his old friend Grover Loening and Fairchild Aircraft. And he also suddenly switched an Air Force heating contract to a newly organized, completely inexperienced company formed by the brother of Gov. J. Caleb Boggs of Delaware.

Talbott had been forced to resign from the Aircraft Procurement Office of the War Production Board during the Roosevelt administration and had been severely castigated by Charles Evans Hughes as guilty of conduct of a reprehensible character in connection with the award of airplane contracts during World War I. The airplane scandal was so serious that Woodrow Wilson appointed Hughes, former Governor of New York and candidate for President of the United States, to investigate. Despite Hughes' scathing indictment of Talbott and his father, of Charles Kettering, and of Col. Edward Deeds, head of Delco Battery, which became part of General Motors, Talbott was picked by Eisenhower to head the Air Force.

Such is the power of political campaign funds.

Eventually, Talbott's partisanship toward favored companies, particularly Paul B. Mulligan & Co., in which he was a partner, brought a Senate investigation and forced his resignation as Secretary of the Air Force. But in the interim, he had switched Cape Canaveral from operation by the Air Force to private-contract operation under his old political comrade in fund raising, Sam Pryor of Pan American Airways.

Curious facts about this contract have been dug out of Pentagon files. The man directly concerned with the negotiations under Talbott was Assistant Secretary Roger Lewis, who received General Cook's memo quoted earlier. In his own handwriting, Lewis scrawled his approval of the memo: "I concur in General Cook's endorsement of contractor operation as opposed to AF (Air Force). Have some questions about contract details however." Finally, on December 21, 1953, Lewis signed the order authorizing General Cook to draw up the contract.

From his office in the Pentagon, Lewis watched the bustle going on down at the Cape as the airline took over. On September 21, 1955, he resigned from the Air Force and the very next day joined Pan American Airways as executive vice president.

His starting salary was a comfortable $28,000 per year plus bonuses, almost double his Air Force pay. He was also let in on a company plan that permitted him to buy 15,000 shares of Pan Am stock over a 10-year period at the market value on December 6, 1955. Only three vice presidents, all company veterans, were offered this amount of stock. Other vice presidents who had been with the company several years were offered as little as 6,000 shares.

Outlining Lewis' new duties, Pan American president Juan T. Trippe wrote: "Your initial assignments will include supervision of company projects relating to the national defense, including operating supervision of the guided missile range project." Trippe was careful to add that Lewis would not participate in any negotiations with the Air Force. It was an obvious and minimum caution. Anything less would probably have landed the airline in legal difficulties.

Trippe has since sworn that Lewis had no discussions with Pan Am while he was considering the missile-range contract and that Lewis had actually submitted his resignation to the Air Force before he was invited to join the company. These protestations, however, have not dispelled the cloud that hangs over the strange transfer of Cape Canaveral to Pan American Airways.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I recognize that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER] is about to make a major address on another matter. I shall proceed to the conclusion of the discussion about this book.

In the briefings with the Secretary of Defense and the Joint Chiefs of Staff and General White and General Taylor I came to certain conclusions in regard to the seriousness of the defense situation as I see it. I had pointed out I would vote for whatever can be shown is needed to maintain the deterrent strength of my country against the military threat of Russia, because there is a threat. If the time ever came when Russia thought she would have anything to gain by a military course of action, I think she would follow it. But I recognize that the greatest threat of Russia during the next 100 years is not a military threat, but an economic threat; and I do not think we are taking the steps necessary to develop the economical potential of our country to meet that threat in the field of foreign policy, or domestically, either, for that matter. That is why I have made this point about the failure of the Eisenhower administration to recognize that capital investments in wealth-creating objectives do not involve merely Government expenditures, but involve sound business.

I listened to the officials of the Pentagon building raise the question as to whether we were ahead of Russia in this or that field, and I listened to one of them say over and over again in his testimony that the trouble with the American people is that they are not cynical enough, that they must be more cynical about the Russians, that they must recognize we cannot negotiate with the Russians, that the Russians will participate in negotiations only if they are going to be to their advantage. After listening to that cynicism, I was satisfied what the end of the road would be if the country followed this general's philosophy. The chairman of the committee then asked me, when it come my turn to ask questions, if I had any questions, and I said, "Before I ask a question I want to make a comment that sets forth my impressions of the testimony to which I have been listening:" I said, "One of the witnesses said we should be more cynical. I want him to know I am so cynical that his views are unadulterated optimism in comparison. He has been warning us about what is going to happen to our country if we do not do this or that to keep up in the present armanent race. He has been asked the rhetorical question as to whether Russia is ahead on this, or the Nation is ahead on that. I want to tell him, as I have listened to the Secretary of Defense, as I have listened to the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and as I have listened now to the head of the Air Force and the head of the Army, I am satisfied that the only ones who would be ahead would be the archeologists a thousand years from today."

When they come to dig up this transcript, then history will record who was ahead. I want to say, surely, we will vote for what is necessary for deterrent strength, but too often that approach seems to make deterrent strength the end rather than a means toward peace. I would suggest to the generals that they need to read some history and recognize that our period in the history of civilization will be no different from that of past periods, if we blindly proceed with a mad armament race with Russia.

The end would be the end of our whole era of civilization. I would say to the officials in the Pentagon building that this mad armament race being participated in by Russia and the Western Powers, including my own country, is an armament race which is bound to end in disaster for Russia and the United States and our western allies, because the testimony itself shows what the destruction will be on both sides if a full nuclear war should break out.

Unpopular as it is in a time of fear, Mr. President, it nevertheless needs to be said: Russia and the Western Powers, including the United States, are in violation of the moral law; and the history of civilization teaches that when any nation for long violates the moral law, it writes its own destruction. One cannot proceed with the immorality of a nuclear armament race if he believes in a God, and expect his civilization to survive. That is why I say, Mr. President, it is so important that, in the midst of our voting funds for whatever is necessary for deterrent strength, we completely discard the notion that we cannot negotiate. We have to negotiate; not on any basis of appeasement but on the basis of getting the facts to the people of the world.

As I said to the generals in the Committee on Foreign Relations the other day, "I will tell you who is going to take care of the United States and of our western allies and of Russia and the Communist segment of the world. It will be those millions of people in Asia and Africa who recognize already the immorality of our position and of Russia's position."

That was evidenced by the question I asked the generals, "What have you to tell the committee about known facts as to the danger to the health of future generations of people for the next several hundred years if we continue in increasing amounts the testing of nuclear weapons?" What did one of the generals say? He said, "Oh, but the experts are in disagreement as to what the effects will be." The record will show I replied, "Am I to therefore conclude there is no danger, because the scientists are in disagreement?"

I then suggested to the chairman of the committee that the Disarmament Subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate owes it to the American people to proceed this year with the most thorough investigation yet conducted into the effects upon the health of generations unborn of a continuation of the letting loose in the atmosphere of the fallout of nuclear testing.

The interesting thing, Mr. President, is that there is agreement among the scientists that if Russia and the Western Powers involve themselves in a nuclear war the radiation which will be let loose from that war not only will destroy millions of our generation but also will bring havoc upon the world for hundreds of years to come on all forms of life, as life struggles again out of the depths of a new dark ages to the light of a new civilization.

I made those comments, Mr. President, because I think they are very closely related to the contents of the book. In the interest of time, but so that there will be some documentation in the RECORD today in support of the comments I have made about the book, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD what the publishers have to say on the flyleaf of the book in regard to the book's purpose, as well as the material on the back of the flyleaf.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"U.S.A.—Second Class Power?" is the shocking story of how we have let ourselves fall behind scientifically and militarily in the age of earth satellites and missiles. It tells precisely where we stand today in relation to the Russian achievements and what we must do to insure our survival.

When the first Russian sputnik began circling the globe on October 4, 1957, our country woke up to the fact that we had fallen dangerously behind in scientific research and defense preparedness. The Russians had successfully carried through a crash program in rocket development that called for a reappraisal of their whole scientific achievement and potential. At the same time, thinking Americans demanded to know what had gone wrong with our defense program, just how bad off we were, and how we could catch up.

This book gives the answers. It tells how our rocket research began, how the Government has withheld vital information, how budget-cutting and bickering and business rivalry have been added to indecision and shortsightedness to bring on the crisis.

In their tireless pursuit of the truth, the authors use much confidential information that needs to be made known to the American people. They are outspokenly critical, in the way for which Drew Pearson has become famous, on this subject of vital interest to every American—his own survival.

U.S.A.—SECOND-CLASS POWER?

What has been the reason for our downhill skid in power and prestige? The Gaither report puts the blame on bickering between the Armed Forces. This, of course, was true but it is an understatement. There are many reasons. They go back to the terrorism of the McCarthy era when we drove scientists out of Government. They go back to the easygoing complacency of our educational system, our concentration on football and snap courses rather than science, and our failure to pay teachers a living wage. They go back to the passionate budget-cutting of Secretary of the Treasury George Humphrey and his willingness to put a balanced budget ahead of national security. They go back to the scramble for orders by the defense contractors who have almost more influence inside the Pentagon than the President of the United States and who, consciously or unconsciously, have sometimes put profits ahead of patriotism. They also go back to the dangerous American political system of raising tremendous amounts of money to elect candidates and then paying off the contributors with defense contracts. They involve personal jealousy and rivalry of the type that almost prevented Adm. Hyman Rickover from building our first atomic submarine. They involve the genial personality of a Secretary of Defense who wanted to be loved more than he wanted to crack military heads together.

But perhaps as much as any other fact, the reasons why we fell behind Russia go back to the personality of the Commander in Chief. He too wanted to be loved. And during the course of his military career in Europe and his campaigning for the Presidency, he had built up a public love and devotion and prestige that amounted to a father image. Because of that image and because of his long service in the Army, the Nation trusted him. He could do no wrong. They did not know that he was complacent, easygoing, unwilling to spend the long hours of grueling grind which any President must spend if he is to lead the Nation. That Dwight D. Eisenhower was not willing to do these things, that he honestly believed he could serve as a part-time President, that he did not have the courage to deal forcefully with his old buddies in the Pentagon or the budget cutters in the Treasury Department is one of the chief reasons why the United States today finds itself in the gravest danger in all history.

And to the press of the United States, which failed to report both the inadequacies of our national defense and the inadequacy of our Commander in Chief, must go part of the blame. (From chapter II, "Gravity of the Crisis.")

Mr. MORSE. I also ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD what the publishers of the book have to say about the background of the two authors, Mr. Pearson and Mr. Anderson.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ABOUT THE AUTHORS

Drew Pearson was born in Evanston, Ill., and educated at Phillips Exeter Academy and Swarthmore College. Following a period of relief work with the American Friends Service Committee, he taught at the University of Pennsylvania and Columbia University. He was a roving foreign correspondent for several years before settling in Washington. His first book, "Washington Merry-Go-Round," written with Robert S. Allen, led to the daily newspaper column of that name published since 1932, and currently syndicated in the Washington Post, the New York Mirror, the Chicago American, the Los Angeles Mirror, and more than 600 other newspapers. He has sponsored the Friendship

Train, helped to organize the Freedom Balloon campaign, and in 1948 was named Father of the Year. Though he works under high pressure at his office in Georgetown and his Maryland dairy farm, his quiet, almost retiring personality shows no trace of the hardboiled reporter.

Jack Anderson, a native of Salt Lake City, studied at the University of Utah and George Washington University. He began working with Drew Pearson in 1948, following 2 years with the Stars and Stripes in Chungking and Shanghai, China. He is the coauthor, with Ronald May, of "McCarthy: The Man, the Senator, the Ism."

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, in the foreword of the book the authors say:

We will go one step further and venture the opinion that the American who states that Russia's emergence as a first-class power may be a healthy stimulus to the United States runs the risk of being considered a betrayer of the American way of life and an admirer of the Soviet system. He may even come under scrutiny by the FBI. Yet if we are frank with ourselves, we have to admit that for too long have we been confident, fat, and complacent. Too long have we put self-interest ahead of national interest, ease before duty, luxury before sacrifice, golf before decisions, Thunderbirds before missiles, Madison Avenue camouflage before truth.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the entire foreword of the book be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the foreword was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is inescapable that this book will arouse a great deal of criticism. We hastily add that it was not written for that purpose. It is only human to prefer praise to criticism, and the authors, despite some things said about them, are not inhuman. But they are convinced that the emergence of Russia from the wheelbarrow age to the atomic age is the greatest miracle of modern times. And while the American who says this publicly is likely to be blasted as pro-Communist by the Un-American Activities Committee, yet if America doesn't recognize this fact, it is likely to get blasted off the face of the earth.

We will go one step further and venture the opinion that the American who states that Russia's emergence as a first-class power may be a healthy stimulus to the United States runs the risk of being considered a betrayer of the American way of life and an admirer of the Soviet system. He may even come under scrutiny by the FBI. Yet if we are frank with ourselves, we have to admit that for too long have we been confident, fat, and complacent. Too long have we put self-interest ahead of national interest, ease before duty, luxury before sacrifice, golf before decisions, Thunderbirds before missiles, Madison Avenue camouflage before truth.

It is sometimes difficult to face the truth. It is much easier to accuse a critic of our shortcomings of not telling the truth, to brand him a liar or a headline hunter, or even a pro-Communist, if he comes up with unpleasant facts about the waning power and prestige of the United States of America. Yet it is a fact that for some time we have been slipping. Not only have we been slipping, but we have been afraid to admit the fact that we were slipping. The shameful desertions and surrenders of American troops in Korea were the first sign that something had gone wrong. They were also the first sign that we were afraid to face the degree to which we had put materialism ahead of patriotism. The American public still does not know that the shocking confessions made by American prisoners in Korea were by no means all exacted by torture; that Turkish, British, Canadian, and other United Nations troops did not turn their backs on their countries to anywhere near the same degree. The American public does not know that Gen. William F. Dean, captured commander of the 7th Infantry Division, gave 12 different statements to the enemy. Never in all history have so many Americans, including high-ranking officers, disgraced the uniform of the country which spawned them, protected them, and gave them the freedoms of which they should have been proud—but which they took for granted.

After the Korean war came a deluge of defeats, diplomatic and otherwise, culminating with the events of 1957–58 when the world woke up to find Russia occupying outer space while the United States occupied Central High School in Arkansas.

The world recognized our defeats, but, generally speaking, the American people did not. We played up defeat in Korea as if it were a victory. We pussyfooted so long in Indochina that most of it went Communist. We bungled so badly in the Near East that its vast oil reserves are slipping through our fingers. We have affronted and antagonized and alienated our allies in Western Europe until the North Atlantic Treaty Organization has become a military shell. The world knows this, but we do not.

It is not pleasant to criticize the United States of America. He who does so is accused of losing faith in his country. But the American people cannot meet the challenge of the powerful, tireless government that threatens them if they are fed sugar-coated half-truths and soothing syrup. They must know the facts.

We cannot sit back and wait for bickering inside the Kremlin to deliver Russia into our hands. The walls of the Kremlin are not like the walls of Jerico. They will not come tumbling down after seven statements by John Foster Dulles. Nor will they yield to a civilization in which an Elvis Presley makes more than the President of the United States, in which truckdrivers in Chicago are paid more than many schoolteachers, in which one-third of all prescriptions filled at drugstores are for tranquilizing pills. The road to Miltown is not the road to victory over the vigorous and unscrupulous government that rules Russia. We cannot win the battle for freedom or the great goal of peace if we keep our heads in the sands of ignorance.

The ingredients of greatness, however, have not gone out of the bones of the American people. They are equal to great challenge—if they know the facts. It is in order that they may know the facts that this book is written.

The material that has gone into its chapters has been obtained from scores of Army, Navy, and Air Force officers, civilian defense experts, scientists, and diplomats who have the welfare of their country at heart. The material is also based on several years of covering foreign affairs and the defense news of Washington. It is based on six trips abroad during the past 2 years.

We are indebted to many for advice and guidance in the preparation of this book—to the former Secretary of the Air Force, now Senator from Missouri, Stuart Symington; his assistant Edward Welch; to Senators Estes Kefauver of Tennessee and Henry Jackson of Washington of the Senate Armed Services Committee; to Senator William Fulbright of Arkansas of the Foreign Relations Committee; to Trevor Gardner, the former Assistant Secretary of Defense; Wernher von Braun of the Army Ballistic Missile Agency; Lt. Gen. James Gavin; Adm. Hyman Rickover; Dr. Harold Urey of the University of Chicago, former Senator William Benton of Connecticut; John Kennedy, publisher of the Sioux Falls (S. Dak.) Argus-Leader, who gave us the results of his several trips to Russia; Eric Berghaust, editor of Missiles and Rockets; Clay Blair, author of The Atomic Submarine; Louis Johnson, former Secretary of Defense; Tom Wilcox, formerly of the Air Office of Scientific Research; Don Ludlow, Washington correspondent for the London Mirror; Herschel Schooley, formerly of the Defense Department; Capt. William Chamliss, U.S.N.; and Col. John R. Nickerson, whose explosive memo first revealed some of the basic defects of our missile program.

Finally, we are indebted to a hundred or so officers of the armed services who cannot speak out in public but who believe that without imitating the Soviet Union as to methods we can meet its challenge; who believe that the United States does not have to become a second-class power.

To that end, this book is written.

Mr. MORSE. I wish to especially emphasize the paragraph which reads:

It is not pleasant to criticize the United States of America. He who does so is accused of losing faith in his country. But the American people cannot meet the challenge of the powerful, tireless government that threatens them if they are fed sugar-coated half-truths and soothing sirup. They must know the facts.

To give only an example to appeal to the appetite of the reader, I invite attention to a paragraph or two in the book which deals with the U.S. Maginot Line, particularly as stated on page 42:

When the Great Wall of China was constructed along the Manchurian border north of Peking, historians record, it lulled the people of China into a false sense of security. And when the city of Peking finally fell, it was the rocket, first forerunner of the modern missile, which finally subdued that mighty fortress.

Today it is Russian missiles which can make the most modern and ramified defense system ever conceived by man just as out of date as the Great Wall of China.

The authors go on to make some comments on the false security we may be laboring under with respect to our foreign bases, and whether those bases give us the security the Pentagon experts in fact are testifying to. I ask unanimous consent that certain paragraphs from that chapter be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the paragraphs were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

When the Great Wall of China was constructed along the Manchurian border north of Peking, historians record, it lulled the people of China into a false sense of security. And when the city of Peking finally fell, it was the rocket, first forerunner of the modern missile, which finally subdued that mighty fortress.

Today it is Russian missiles which can make the most modern and ramified defense system ever conceived by man just as out of date as the Great Wall of China.

Wheelus Air Force Base in Libya is the biggest American air base in the world outside the United States. But it could be wiped out in just a few minutes. It could be wiped out not by an air attack, as the Japanese attacked Pearl Harbor, but by intermediate-range missiles based just behind the Iron Curtain in Bulgaria.

Russia has the missiles and she has the bases. While the United States argued as to which missiles to build and who should build them, the Soviet proceeded to turn out several thousand ballistic missiles with a range of 1,000 to 1,800 miles. Carrying, as they do, hydrogen warheads, one missile could wipe out an entire base. And Russia has enough missiles to fire more than one missile at each base.

There is nothing the lonely watchers in the Arctic DEW line can do to warn of missile attacks. Their approach is too fast. The elaborate machinery, the intricate electronic equipment, the phone lines, the snowbank houses of the northern Maginot line costing a total of $18 billion, all are now mere monuments to our frantic, futile search for safety.

Nothing the heroic Air Force pilots who scramble into their jets every dawn could do would save Wheelus. Nothing the 7,000 airmen who dutifully go about their job of supporting a little piece of America in north Africa could do would save Wheelus. Its wooden barracks and concrete installations, its hangers and its gas tanks, its theaters and its churches, its officers' club with the bougainvillaea climbing over the veranda, its neat rows of married men's quarters with gay marigolds in front and children's perambulators on the back porch—all would go up in a pillar of smoke over the desert.

This is a desert where 15 years ago a German general named Rommel wheeled and maneuvered. For months he dodged, ducked, and eluded the British. But even in the brief period since then, warfare has changed. In this same desert, a whole tank corps once could hide. But not any more. The ancient rocket which once humbled the Great Wall of China and the city of Peking has come back, sleek, modernized, armed with a hydrogen warhead, to revolutionize military power and make obsolete the American Maginot line.

The water of the Mediterranean is blue and beautiful along the north African coast. Men swim along the beaches—when they can duck modern man's habit of fouling his nest with his own sewage. But blue and beautiful as that water is, it harbors the possibility of even greater danger than the IRBM; namely, Russian submarines. It is only about 100 feet from the sea to the home of the commander of Wheelus Airbase. The entire base is built along the sea. One missile from a submarine lying low in the blue and beautiful Mediterranean could knock Wheelus out. The sub wouldn't even have to surface. And it wouldn't have to come all the way from Russian waters. As Harry Truman remarked, "For 200 years the Czars wanted to penetrate down through the Bosporus to the Mediterranean, but failed. Today the leaders of the Kremlin have three submarine bases in the Mediterranean—one in Albania, one in Syria, and one in Egypt. Stalin must be laughing in his grave."

Further west in Morocco, our big bomber bases at Sidi Slimane are 2,000 miles away from the Iron Curtain and out of range of Russian IREM's. But feverishly in the little country of Albania the Kremlin is constructing three huge missile bases—launching sites for new IRBM's to be aimed squarely at Sidi Slimane and the row of sleek windswept B–47's lined up on the runway, each guarded by an air policeman with cocked revolver and each carrying a hydrogen bomb the equivalent of all the explosives dropped in World War II. When those Albanian bases are finished, when those new IRBM's are installed, those B–47's will not be able to remain on the runway anymore.

When the Russian sputnik was first launched on October 4, 1957, and when the first dread news seeped in on the American public that Russia had developed an intercontinental ballistic missile, President Eisenhower took pains to emphasize the importance of our Strategic Aid Command and the ring of bases surrounding Russia which make up the American Maginot line. His was a public statement.

But privately Gen. Thomas D. White, Chief of Staff of the Air Force, simultaneously warned Secretary of Defense McElroy that our Strategic Air Command was falling apart. He predicted Russia would surpass us in strategic bombing power by the end of 1958. He begged for more big bombers until such time as American ballistic missiles would be in production. Secretary McElroy gave him the alternative of 52 more B–52's or 47 faster, short-range B–58's. White insisted the Air Force needed both. The Secretary of Defense claimed there wasn't enough money in the budget. Reluctantly, White chose the B–58's, but with a warning that by 1959 Russia will be ahead of the United States in both bombers and missiles, able to destroy all overseas bases with a shotgun salvo of atomic-tipped missiles.

Mr. MORSE. There has been a great controversy in the political debate recently with regard to the part the President has played with respect to the ICBM program, as to whether he gave it the support it should have received, and as to whether he was responsible for the slowdown in the advancement of the program.

I ask unanimous consent to have certain paragraphs starting on page 57 of the book printed as a part of my remarks, without taking the time to read them.

There being no objection, the paragraphs were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The MX–774, as the big ballistic baby was known in 1947, belonged technically to the Army, whose chief overlord was Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower, He had come back from the Supreme Allied Command in Europe to replace General Marshall in the most important military post in the continental United States of America, Chief of Staff of the Army. It was a time of postwar reductions when he and most of the American people were more concerned with budgets than ballistics. The world was hoping for peace. So, less than 6 months after the speedup order, reverse instructions were delivered to slow down the MX–774. Convair was told that it would have to get along for 2 years on the funds allotted for 1 year. This brought a written objection from Albert Lombard, a project engineer, that the MX–774 "must receive backing financially on a scale somewhat of the magnitude of the German (rocket) activities at Peenemunde."

This objection is one of the secret papers that has arisen from the dead files of the Pentagon to haunt the planners charged with keeping the United States ahead of Russia. The tragedy is that component parts of the first MX–774 missiles were already in the machine shops when, on July 1, 1947, their death notice arrived from Washington. Economy was in the air. Because of it, the air generals decided that they could concentrate on only one intercontinental missile and that a slower, air-breathing missile, subsequently called the Snark, would be easier to construct and surer of success. Work had already been started on the Snark. It had wings and therefore was more comprehensible to the men who believed in wings.

It was General Eisenhower, then Chief of Staff, who approved the order killing off project MX–774. He acted, of course, on the advice of his experts who faced budget cuts.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President on page 121 we find a very interesting account of the activity of the Madison Avenue advertisers and the relationship between their programs and campaign contributions. I ask unanimous consent that certain paragraphs from that section of the book be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the paragraphs were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Those who give Jim Hagerty sole credit for building up the Eisenhower myth forget the help he has had from Madison Avenue and the advertising agencies whose tentacles reach into the highest board rooms of magazines, newspapers and television. When the Democratic National Committee wanted to find an advertising agency to handle its national publicity, it could discover only one, William H. Weintraub, Inc., which was Democratic. Most of the others were not only Republican, but their executives had contributed to the Republican Presidential campaign of 1956 as follows:

Batten, Barton, Durstine & Osborn	$5,000
Benton & Bowles	1,500
Biow-Beirn-Toigo (now Biow Co.)	2,000
Campbell-Ewald Co	11,350
Dancer-Fitzgerald-Sample	1,000
D'Arcy Advertising Co	1,500
Foote, Cone & Belding	500
Geyer Advertising	500
J. Walter Thompson Co	12,600
Kenyon & Eckhardt	3,000
Kudner Agency	500
Lennen & Newell	2,000
Leo Burnett Co	500
MacManus, John & Adams	500
Maxon, Inc	500
McCann-Erickson	1,650
Ruthrauff & Ryan	500
Sullivan, Stauffer, Colwell & Bayles	1,000
William Esty Co	3,000
Young & Rubicam	2,500

When Eisenhower appointed Jock Whitney as Ambassador to London, the American public did not know that, besides contributing with his wife $47,100 to Eisenhower's campaign fund, Whitney owned TV stations in Tulsa, Galveston, Houston, Indianapolis, and Fort Wayne, Ind. Whitney could, and did, influence important segments of the American public. Or when Eisenhower appointed Clare Boothe Luce to be Ambassador to Italy, most people did not fully comprehend the fact that her husband's magazines, Time, Life, and Fortune, not only made subservient obeisance before the Eisenhower pedestal, but also owned television stations in Salt Lake City, Denver, Minneapolis, Indianapolis, and Grand Rapids, all of them influencing public opinion, and all of them contributing to the complacency of the American public regarding our missile-satellite defeat.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, starting on page 138 there is a detailed account of the controversy which has been waged in this country with regard to defense contracts in connection with the Vanguard program and the part that American big business has played in this matter. I ask unanimous consent that certain paragraphs be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the paragraphs were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Part of the story revolves around Dr. Richard Porter, an amiable six-foot scientist with a full shock of white hair, who since 1937 has been on the payroll of General Electric as a rocket expert. Simultaneously, he has been advising the United States Government on rocket matters. His history is strung together on the strong cord of loyalty to his company.

As the Allied armies rolled back the Nazi war machine in 1944–45, Porter was hurried to Germany to analyze German rocket research. Although he wore an Army uniform and reported to the Army, he remained a civilian on GE salary. It was not unusual at that time for companies to loan technical experts to the military. Porter remained in Germany five months, at one time helping to round up the families of German scientists and rush them out of the Soviet Zone before the Iron Curtain could clamp down on them.

On his return home, Porter turned over his technical reports not only to the Army but also to General Electric. The Army next put him in charge of firing the captured German V–2 rockets at White Sands, N. Mex. Again Porter made the results of his research available to General Electric, which, benefiting by this information, got a contract to build the first ballistic missiles for the Army. As chief engineer, Porter designed the engines which General Electric installed in those early A–1, A–2, and A–3 missiles.

What he did was improve the V–2 motor and call it the Hermes engine. Some technical experts claim this GE-brand Hermes engine was unsatisfactory. Others explain that the A–1, A–2, and A–3 missiles were designed to hurl large atomic warheads, which because of the development of small warheads became obsolete. In any event, the Army canceled the A–1 and A–2 missiles, and although General Electric developed a more refined motor for the A–3, this too was wiped out in 1951. Meanwhile, the Army decided to go all out for missiles on its own at its arsenal at Huntsville. This left GE holding the bag. It had a considerable missile investment but no place to use it.

Naturally Dr. Porter owed it to his company to find new outlets for these multimillion-dollar rocket facilities. A scientist of great ability, he rose in astronautical circles to become president of the American Rocket Society. Serving under him, as chairman of the Space Flight Committee, was Milton Rosen, in charge of the Navy's Viking rocket program.

The Viking, designed by the Martin Company, already had an engine built by Reaction Motors. But Dr. Porter sold Rosen on the idea of developing an improved Viking with a GE motor. They talked of using it as a satellite launcher, a possibility which they pursued through the Rocket Society; and on November 24, 1954, Rosen summed up the arguments for an earth satellite in a technical report to the society. Apparently he did not known that the Orbiter team had already presented blueprints to the Defense Department for a satellite project.

Dr. Porter, who shared Rosen's dream of sending a satellite into space aboard an improved Viking, powered by a GE engine, forwarded the report to the National Science Foundation, which was preparing for the International Geophysical Year. The IGY Committee, eager to exploit this great scientific occasion, was persuaded by the report to go ahead with a satellite program. So impressed was the Committee, in fact, that it invited Porter to head the satellite panel.

The chief problem in launching a satellite is getting enough force to break through the crust of atmosphere surrounding the earth. To heave this sort of scientific shotput into space, therefore, the IGY scientists needed rocket power that could be found only in the Defense Establishment. Their appeal to the Pentagon resulted in the January 1955 decision to let the Army and Navy go ahead with Project Orbiter. Porter, Rosen, and company, however, had other ideas about getting the rocket power to launch a satellite.

They became the storm center of a scientific uproar over using military weapons as satellite launchers. For the sake of pure science, they preferred building special research rockets. Disgruntled whispers were also heard regarding the Army's use of imported German scientists. There was talk of making the satellite an "all-American" project, thus ruling out Dr. von Braun's team.

The agitation against Project Orbiter reached such a pitch that Donald Quarles, as the Pentagon's research chief, formed a secret nine-man committee to review proposals from all three services. He selected as chairman Dr. Homer Stewart, of the California Institute of Technology. Also named to the committee was none other than General Electric's Dr. Porter, who as IGY satellite chief was in a unique position to influence his colleagues.

The existence of the committee has never been officially acknowledged. Dr. Stewart refused to admit that he had anything to do with it, even though it came to be called by his name.

"I can't talk," he said, when queried by the authors.

"My instructions don't permit me to comment at all," he said when pressed further. "You can't even comment as to whether you are chairman of the Stewart committee?"

"No; I can't comment on whether I am chairman of the committee. All I can say is that I've served on several committees."

This locking of the stable door after the horse was stolen was to cover up error, not protect security. The satellite project, as emphasized by no less than President Eisenhower, was a scientific, not a military project. Regardless of this secrecy, here are the censored facts as to what happened inside the Stewart committee.

Three alternatives were placed before its members. They were:

1. The Army proposed to continue with Project Orbiter. Dr. von Braun of the Army gave a flat promise that he could launch a 15-pound satellite in a year. This would have put the launching date in mid-1956, well ahead of the International Geophysical Year, which began July 1, 1957, and during which Russia was expected to launch a satellite.

2. The Navy supported Rosen's proposed new Viking, which, it claimed, would be a more sophisticated rocket and could launch a 40-pound satellite. The Navy later admitted that it could launch a satellite of only half that weight.

3. The Air Force proposed an ambitious plan to launch a supersatellite with equipment from its intercontinental-ballistic-missile program, even though that equipment was still undeveloped.

There is little doubt that Dr. Porter played a powerful part in working out the final decision, which adopted the Navy's Viking rocket with the General Electric motor, thereby scuppering the Army's Orbiter. He was supported by Dr. Joseph Kaplan, chairman of the IGY Committee, who admitted knowing little about guided missiles but who argued that more instruments could be packed in a 40-pound than a 15-pound satellite. Voting with them were Dr. Charles C. Lauritsen, of Cal Tech; Professor John Rosser, of Cornell; Gerald M. Clemence, of the Naval Observatory; and Admiral Paul Smith, secretary of the committee.

Only three men voted for Orbiter: Dr. Stewart, the chairman; Dr. Robert McMath, University of Michigan; and Dr. Clifford Furnas, University of Buffalo, who later succeeded Quarles as Assistant Defense Secretary in charge of research. They argued that speed was the most important consideration and that the Army project offered the best chance to beat Russia into space.

The arguments which sent Orbiter back to the shelf paid little attention to the harsh facts of Russian competition and the damage to national prestige of a Soviet first in the satellite race. The Army was fully conscious of this peril and wanted to get a satellite up ahead of Russia, even by rough-and-ready means. But the Stewart committee seemed determined that Orbiter should never get off the ground. It not only voted for the Navy project but as a second alternative recommended going ahead with the Air Force proposal. Orbiter was kicked into a corner.

The day after the committee's decision, Dr. Stewart confided to Von Braun, "We have pulled a great boner." It was not until January 31, 1958, 3 years later, as the United States finally put a 30-pound Orbiter satellite renamed the Explorer into space 4 months behind Russia, that Dr. Stewart was to see his prophecy fully confirmed.

Back in July 1955, it must have been gratifying to Porter when the Martin Co., obeying the Navy's specifications, switched from Reaction to GE engines to launch the new satellite. The name, too, was changed, from Viking to Vanguard. Friends claim that Dr. Porter did not realize the Vanguard would use GE motors and that he would never put his company's interest ahead of his country. When the authors asked Dr. Porter about the fact that his company benefited from the switch of motors, he replied, "I don't know anything about the contract."

In a subsequent conversation he was more candid. Apologizing for having been previously evasive, Dr. Porter said, "I knew the Vanguard would be using GE engines when I voted for it, but this did not influence my decision. Our recommendation was made strictly on the basis of technical factors."

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, let me make a final comment on what the Senator from Wisconsin said with regard to the relationship between defense contracts and what some of us think to be the inexcusable shortcomings of the Eisenhower administration in the successful prosecution of a program which would give to our country the adequate defenses to which the people have been and are entitled.

Businessmen do not like to hear it mentioned, Mr. President, but the fact is there happens to be no economic group in our country which is such a beneficiary of Government subsidy than the big business group engaged in defense contracts, out of which big business is making tremendous profits, as some of the figures in the Pearson-Anderson book show, which figures have been supported by a good many other sources.

What do Senators suppose would happen to large segments of American business if we stopped giving them the subsidy benefits of defense contracts for manufacturing materials which are of no real benefit to the domestic economy so far as civilian life is concerned, although of great benefit to our security? I have a great deal of difficulty justifying, on moral grounds, such large profits in the form of defense subsidies. I am always amused when some of the business leaders become so excited and agitated because a subsidy to the food producers of this country, which is pigmy in proportion, goes to the farmers. We read propaganda from the National Association of Manufacturers and the United States Chamber of Commerce which would lead us to believe that we are far down the road to socialism because of a farm subsidy program.

Where do Senators think those businessmen would be if it were not for the subsidies they are enjoying from defense contracts?

I close by saying that when a Senator finishes reading the Anderson-Pearson book and sits at his desk in the Senate, he must realize that we have a duty to take a look at what is happening in the field of defense contracts, and eliminate what I am satisfied is a considerable amount of waste in the administration of such defense contracts.

This book deserves attention because sometimes when we are confronted with the journalistic tactic of coverup it becomes necessary to use every vehicle of public information available in order to direct the attention of the American people to a writing as significant to the welfare of the American people as this book, entitled "U.S.A.—Second Class Power?"

Mr. CHURCH subsequently said:

Mr. President, earlier today some of my colleagues addressed themselves to the book "U.S.A.—Second Class Power?" written by Drew Pearson and Jack Anderson.

Mr. President, I am now reading that book. Having not yet had an opportunity to complete reading the book, I am not in a position to pass judgment on it. However, I have already been struck by the scope of the work and the ambitious undertaking of the authors in apprising us of the thinking that underlies our current military program.

Although this program is properly in the hands of professional military men, I think it would be error to discount civilian appraisal of our military planning. Rather, I think the very fact that the book is the work of civilians ought to commend it to us for especially careful attention. I say this because it seems to me that we have no basis whatever to evaluate or appraise the present course of military policy except in the context of opposite alternatives.

I think one of the contributions made by the authors of this book is that of presenting to us other possible alternatives which give us a basis for evaluating the present course of action.

Now, Mr. President, I respect professional military judgment, but I do not think it is infallible, nor do I think history would support the contention that it is infallible. We remember that it was back as far as the American Revolutionary War when Yankee ingenuity brought forth the first submarine. Yet it took the Germans, a century later, to demonstrate to us the devastating effectiveness of the submarine as a weapon of war.

Likewise, the industrial economy of the United States in turning out massive numbers of automobiles was perhaps better able to develop and produce in mass numbers tanks and vehicles of mechanized warfare than any other economy of any other nation, yet again it was our sad experience in the second World War that the Germans had to demonstrate the validity of the blitzkrieg theory, which as discounted by the military people both in the United States and in western Europe, to our great peril. Fortunately we had time to recoup in that war, to reorient our military thinking, and to rebuild our forces along different lines from what our professional military people had theretofore advised.

Just a few months ago, it was my pleasure to go to Pearl Harbor and revisit the scene of the infamous attack by the Japanese naval air forces which led to our participation in the Second World War. Anybody who goes there will be reminded in a most dramatic and unforgettable way of the success of the attack against what was then regarded as the backbone of the American naval power, the battleship fleet. The attack was 90 percent successful. As a result, not only did we lose the battleship Arizona, but, in addition, the battleships Nevada, Oklahoma, California, West Virginia, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Tennessee were so seriously damaged that none was put into effective service for many months following the attack. Despite that, in a few short months we were able in the battle of Midway to turn the course of the Pacific war with planes from aircraft carriers.

I think the naval history of that war will support me in the statement that submarines and aircraft carriers, not battleships, contributed principally to our success in the Pacific. Once again I am sorry to say this happening was in conflict with the most respected professional naval thinking, which long had based American naval strength upon the battleship.

I therefore submit that we not only need civilian appraisal of military policy, but we should commend those who undertake it. I feel that in this particular case Mr. Pearson and Mr. Anderson are deserving of our commendation in the effort that they have made, and I think their book and their conclusions are entitled to the most careful study by the Members of the Senate.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHURCH. I am happy to yield to the distinguished Senator from Montana.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I wish to join with the Senator from Idaho in the remarks he has just made. I have read the book. It gives one an unhappy feeling. It raises a lot of questions, and I think that the answers should be forthcoming. It is my hope that the Senate Preparedness Subcommittee will investigate into some of the details as to questions raised in the book, and that the answers which we do not seem to have at the present time will be forthcoming.

There is a great deal of confusion, I am sure, in the minds of the American people, because there certainly is confusion in the minds of the Senators, as to where we stand in the field of missiles, for example. We should like to know exactly what the true story is, insofar as it is possible to tell it to us, so that we can, with that ingenuity which the distinguished Senator from Idaho has mentioned, put our shoulders to the wheel, so to speak, and try to overcome the discrepancy and the degree of inequality which seems to exist between the United States and the Soviet Union.

This is a book worth reading. It is not a book one has to agree with, but it is a book one has to think about. I hope its effect will be felt. I hope the questions it raises will be considered, so that all of us, I repeat, can have a better idea than the confused one we have at the present time of the state of the defenses of our country.

I thank the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I wish to express my appreciation to the distinguished Senator from Montana for his remarks and for his contribution to the discussion of this important and timely subject.

SENATOR ELLENDER'S REPORT ON HIS INSPECTION TOUR IN SOUTH AND CENTRAL AMERICA

Mr. ELLENDER obtained the floor.

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me before he begins his speech? I know what he is about to discuss, and, for the general information of the entire Senate, I should like to suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield for that purpose, provided I do not lose the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, when Congress recessed last year, I again undertook an inspection tour of some of our operations abroad under the auspices of the Senate Appropriations Committee, of which I am a member.

On four of my journeys, which were made between the years 1946 and 1952, I did not file formal reports. I merely made verbal reports. Since 1952 I have been making formal reports and the committee print, a copy of which is on each Senator's desk, is the seventh consecutive formal report I have made to the committee.

Mr. President, I also wish to say that I have traveled alone on all investigation trips I have made since 1952. I have had no secretaries accompany me to help me with this work. The same situation, of course, applies to the report I have submitted this year to the Committee on Appropriations. My own office staff helped compile the report.

However, in a late reading of the recommendations I made, I find that I overlooked a very important one, one dealing with the Inter-American Highway. Mr. President, I strongly urge that this highway be completed as soon as possible. Details dealing with completed mileage and the present condition of the highway can be found beginning on page 185 of my report.

The entire Inter-American Highway contains in excess of 3,000 miles and traverses seven Central American countries. The entire portion of the highway located in Mexico was built with Mexican funds. We did not contribute a penny toward the building of the Mexican segment. The same is true for that portion of the road that passes through El Salvador.

The only money the United States spent in El Salvador, as the record will show, was $1,800,000, to assist in the building of a few bridges. In all other countries, including Guatemala, Nicaragua, Honduras, Costa Rica, and Panama, the U.S. Government furnished two-thirds of the cost of the building of the road, and the host countries furnished the remaining one-third. I am glad to report that contracts have been let for every mile of the uncompleted portion of the road, beginning in Guatemala and extending all the way to the Panama Canal. The entire cost of the road to the American taxpayer will be a little more than $138 million. I sincerely believe this is a good investment. It will enable the people of the various Central American countries to visit one another more often. Of course, it will also be a source of great benefit to U.S. citizens to be able to visit our Latin American neighbors.

This, in my opinion, will bring about a greater degree of understanding between these countries and could bring to an end the tension which presently exists between some of our neighbors to the south.

There is one other point I wish to make about my report. In places it might seem that my remarks are out of date in light of recent events. However, my aim was to present my report on Latin America as I saw things prior to my return to the United States on December 15. I made some remarks about the situation in Cuba at that time, which I hope Senators will read. I do not intend to take the time of the Senate and to clutter the RECORD with my remarks about Cuba. But if Senators will read my early estimate of Fidel Castro, they will find I had him pretty well described. I said that I did not believe Castro was the man to govern Cuba.

I would also like to call attention to remarks I made in the report about various countries, particularly the Dominican Republic. Much has been said in criticism of Generalissimo Trujillo. Of all the countries I visited last year, which included every country in Central America and every country in South America, with the exception of Bolivia and Paraguay, there was not a country I visited which had made more visible progress than the Dominican Republic. There I saw with my own eyes—I traveled quite a bit through the countryside—hospitals, schools, and fine homes which were being erected under the auspices of the present regime.

In the Dominican Republic, I learned, to my surprise, that it possesses one of the largest sugar factories in the world, and I had the opportunity to see this factory at the time of my visit. It, as the report shows, grinds 15,000 tons of sugarcane every 24 hours. It is modern in every respect. To me, it is a great advancement in the production of sugar, which, by the way, is the principal industry of the Dominican Republic.

I may say by way of repetition, because it appears in my report, that I found the least amount of progress being made in Haiti. In my report, I state that although conditions in Haiti are not exactly hopeless, it would take the expenditure of much money to improve economic conditions there.

I found that in Haiti—as in other underdeveloped countries of the world—many of our foreign aid administrators are trying to start at the middle rung of the economic ladder rather than the bottom rung. They have tried to do the job too fast, and go far beyond the capability of the people. In other words, it is my feeling that aid programs should begin at the lowest level and be worked upward very slowly. A man must first be shown how to build a better hut before he is shown how to build a four-bedroom house with three baths.

Many of the projects which the United States has fostered in Haiti through ICA and other operations are, in my opinion, more or less WPA—or make work—projects. For instance, modern machinery is not used to build canals for irrigation purposes. The work is actually carried on to give employment to the greatest number of people. That may be a good thing, but I found it to be very expensive. I learned that prior estimates of projects cost—because of this make-work procedure—are many millions of dollars under what the actual construction costs will be.

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. SMATHERS. I congratulate the able Senator from Louisiana on the report which he is making about his trip through Central and South America. I was privileged to follow him by about 6 weeks. I visited only five or six of the countries, but each of the countries which I visited had been visited earlier by the Senator from Louisiana, and the people were still very much impressed by the interest shown by the Senator from Louisiana in every facet of their life.

I also congratulate the Senator on having the courage to stand in the Senate and make the statement in which many of us who have traveled in that area completely concur, namely, that in the Dominican Republic, which operates under a form of government of which we do not necessarily approve in this country, more schools and hospitals and better health facilities and better roads have been built per thousand persons than in almost any other country in either Central America or South America. Unfortunately, too infrequently are Senators willing to make such an assertion, because they fear that some criticism might be directed to them for having, in some fashion, upheld the hand of Mr. Trujillo. But in this instance, I congratulate the Senator from Louisiana for his statement, and I associate myself with it.

Mr. ELLENDER. I thank my good friend, the distinguished Senator from Florida.

In 1955, I made my first tour of Russia. When I returned, I reported the facts to the Senate as I had seen them. In 1956, I visited Russia again. On my return, again I reported factual data to the Senate and the country. My reward for telling the truth about what I had seen on those two trips was to make myself a target for brickbats.

But, lately, many persons who have visited Russia have found that what I reported was true. It took a sputnik to vindicate the senior Senator from Louisiana and make him a prophet. This launching of the first space vehicle showed the world that my warnings, which had been made for 2 years, were factual reports that great progress was being made in Russia under communism. This does not mean that I want any part of communism; I despise it as much if not more than anyone else. But we had our heads in the sand for too long about Russia. I wanted to warn our people that we could not afford to ignore what Russia was doing, just because we disliked their form of government. I am glad that more and more persons have been visiting that country, to see for themselves the progress which has been made.

My hope is that we can have an accelerated exchange of persons between ourselves and Russia, in order to show the people of Russia what the people of our country have under our form of government. This, I feel, will make them more discontented than they are now. I want to make them envious of America and what we have. Then they will exert pressure upon their leaders to give them the freedoms that we have. This will, I hope, destroy the giant war effort of the Russian Government.

Mr. President, at this time I did not intend to discuss Russia. But in connection with what I have said, and in connection with what my good friend, the Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS] has said, I simply wish to state that I am here to tell what I actually saw in Latin America. I am endeavoring to give to the people of the United States, the Senate, and particularly the members of the Senate Appropriations Committee, as factual a report as I am capable of transmitting.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNAMARA in the chair). Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield to my good friend, the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. MORSE. As the Senator from Louisiana knows, on a good many occasions, not only in the Senate, but elsewhere in the country, I have praised the great contributions the Senator from Louisiana has made to better understanding both in the Senate and throughout the country, of the problems involved in our relationships with Russia. In fact, in my book, the Senator from Louisiana was the first Member of the Senate to point out to us that we had better face the fact that Russia exists.

Mr. ELLENDER. But when I told the truth, a number of persons threw brickbats at me, as the Senator from Oregon is aware.

Mr. MORSE. Oh, yes; I realize that. But the Senator from Louisiana is accustomed to criticism, as is the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. ELLENDER. Of course.

Mr. MORSE. Now the Senator from Louisiana has reported to us on his trip to Latin America.

I want the Senator from Louisiana to know that I have instructed the staff of our subcommittee to proceed to go over with a fine-tooth comb the report of the Senator from Louisiana, and to obtain from it all possible information.

I also want him to know that he will receive from our subcommittee an invitation to work with us in connection with the 2-year study we are getting underway in regard to the problems which exist between the United States and Latin America, to the end of trying to improve our relationships with those countries. As chairman of the subcommittee, I intend to maintain complete objectivity, and—to use a phrase of the Senator from Louisiana—to let the chips fall where they may, as the facts are presented.

I am very much interested in the opinions the Senator from Louisiana has formed. As he knows, I am no admirer of the Government of the Dominican Republic or of Trujillo. However, we are entitled to ascertain the facts. Certainly many policy questions are raised.

For example, I have not yet received any evidence which would lead me to change my course of action in advocating a cessation of military support by us, not only to Trujillo, but, for that matter, to most Latin American countries, because I happen to think it is money down the drain.

Mr. ELLENDER. I have so recommended in my report.

Mr. MORSE. What we need to do is face Russia's economic threat in Latin America for the decades immediately ahead, and demonstrate—as we can—the superiority of our economic system.

So I want the Senator from Louisiana to know that I shall reserve judgment in regard to some of his evaluations of such leaders as Trujillo. But I certainly want him to know that our subcommittee desires to cooperate with him in connection with the economic problems he has raised and in connection with an increase of the exchanges between the United States and the Latin American countries, and to do all we can to resolve the sources of friction which I believe are causing deterioration in United States-Latin American relationships.

Mr. ELLENDER. I thank my good friend, the Senator from Oregon. I wish to say to him that there is not one place in my report where he will find that I have praised any person or any form of government in particular. Instead, I have tried to report facts. I simply noted what I saw—whether it was progress or a lack of progress.

I wish to say frankly that I sincerely believe that many of the countries of Latin America require the leadership of men such as Generalissimo Rafael Trujillo, if results are to be obtained. He has been the head of his government for the past 30 years. I was told that about 2 or 3 weeks before I visited the Dominican Republic, a large birthday party was given for Trujillo in Cuidad Trujillo. I was told by our own Ambassador and the others who represent us there, that some 300,000 persons gathered in that city, to pay tribute to Mr. Trujillo. I wish to say to the Senator from Oregon that in my evaluation I have noted that much progress has been made in the Dominican Republic and I have the concurrence of the people who represent us there.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, at this point, will the Senator from Louisiana yield further to me?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. I am sure the Senator from Louisiana knows that when I say this, I am not seeking to disagree at all with his observations. I did not visit that country, but he did. I only wish to say that we plead for his help and his cooperation in connection with the work of our subcommittee. Then all of us can reach our own, individual conclusions as to the public policy matters involved.

I have no doubt that we are obtaining an accurate report regarding the benefits he saw in the Dominican Republic, insofar as materialistic benefits to the people are concerned.

But let me say that matter raises, of course, such historic questions as this one: Are we simply confronted with a benevolent tyranny? Of course, in the history of mankind there have been many societies in which benevolent tyrants have supplied the people with bread, not with freedom. One of the problems which will confront us in the years ahead is whether we shall lose in other parts of the world by seeming to support tyrannical regimes which deny freedom to the individual.

Mr. ELLENDER. I do not believe that the Senator from Oregon will find such conditions in the Dominican Republic. I found that there was generally no objection on the part of the government to report the facts, as they are seen in that Republic. I did not discuss the case of Gerald Lester Murphy, the American pilot who disappeared under mysterious circumstances in December of 1956, with officials of the Dominican Republic Government. However, I did hear a great deal of criticism from citizens of that country about charges leveled at Trujillo that he was responsible for Murphy's disappearance. Their objection, I was told, was that they did not want outside interference in their affairs.

I wish to say that I talked to many persons in the Dominican Republic. What made an impression on me—and our Ambassador and our other representatives shared that impression—was the great progress that had been made there for the benefit of the people.

I would like to make it very clear that I am in no position to comment on the conduct of the Dominican Republic's Government, one way or the other. I have no personal knowledge of the internal policies of Trujillo's government. I simply reported the great progress I noted. After all, that is what we are looking for—progress that alleviates the plight of the masses.

May I say to my good friend from Oregon that I found many countries less fortunate than the Dominican Republic in natural resources, whose people have not fared nearly as well as the people of the Dominican Republic.

Let us take, for example, Venezuela. As I pointed out in my report, millions of dollars have been poured into that country in payment for its natural resources. However, very little of this money has trickled down to the masses, except in those cases where American and other interests have been exploring for oil and gas. In those areas a good job is being done by U.S. firms in providing, all at their own expense, free schools, good hospitals, fine homes, and wages much higher than the minimums fixed by the government. I gained much satisfaction from seeing such conditions.

As my report shows, I found the same conditions prevailing in the iron mining districts near Cerro Bolivar and on the Orinoco River. I made a trip into that area and saw two new cities being laid out—one on the Orinoco River and another at the base of the huge mountain from which the iron ore is obtained.

It was heartwarming for me to see the local people living in such excellent circumstances. The homes were supplied with electricity, and were fronted with fine streets, sidewalks, and beautiful gardens. And imagine, all of this in an area which not too long ago was nothing but mere jungle.

May I say to my friend from Oregon such conditions make the people take a new lease on life; make them more prosperous, and make them better customers of our products. That is what I tried to point out in my report.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield once more, I shall conclude. The Senator from Louisiana mentioned the so-called Murphy case, which involved a citizen of the State of Oregon——

Mr. ELLENDER. I know all about it. That is why I mentioned the case.

Mr. MORSE. I wish to point out that the record of that case has been rather voluminous. The senior Senator from Oregon has been able to follow only the reports and investigations of our own Government officials. It is not my intention to engage in a discussion of the Murphy case, except to say I think it is a pretty sad case insofar as its handling by the Dominican Republic officials is concerned. However, I have a sense of humor in regard to one aftermath of it, and that is the proposal by the Governor of Oregon that all the benefits of any purchases of products originating in the State of Oregon would be cut off by the Dominican Republic if the representatives in Congress from Oregon did not stop criticizing the Dominican Republic leaders. I am sure the Senator from Louisiana knows that suggestion did not deter me one bit——

Mr. ELLENDER. Not at all.

Mr. MORSE. Because I believe whatever the facts are should be made a matter of public record.

Mr. ELLENDER. I knew the Senator from Oregon was interested in the Murphy case, and I thought I would mention it. My report does not say a thing on the Murphy case. I did not think it was my business to go into a subject which would take extensive investigation, particularly since I did not have that much time available.

Mr. MORSE. I agree.

Mr. ELLENDER. I had limited my investigation to our operations in that area, and to what I saw in 1958 as compared to what I had seen during my previous visit in 1952. I may say to the Senator that what I observed was a revelation. The city of Ciudad Trujillo is beautiful and clean. It has fine markets and nice homes, and the shanties on the periphery of the city are being torn town and replaced by good housing.

I did not go to all cities in the Republic, but, from what I learned from our representatives, fine hospitals and schools are being built throughout the country. At the present rate, it will be but a short period of time before all the people will have access to fine hospitals, good schools, and excellent roads.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I wish to compliment the Senator from Louisiana on another comprehensive reporting job. The Senator from Louisiana has, during the years, traveled in practically every country of the world. I do not imagine that there are very many in which he has not traveled.

Mr. ELLENDER. Only two countries.

Mr. SPARKMAN. There are only two countries into which he has failed to penetrate during the years he has been making annual trips.

Mr. ELLENDER. Those two countries are Bulgaria and Albania.

Mr. SPARKMAN. We have no mission in either place.

Mr. ELLENDER. That is correct. At present we do not have diplomatic relations with those countries. However, I hope that it will be possible to establish diplomatic relations with them so that it will be possible for me to visit them. Notwithstanding the facts I may learn on such a trip, I will then have made a visit to every country in the world.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I certainly hope the Senator will get into those two countries. If any American is able to, I am sure he eventually will.

Mr. ELLENDER. Thank you.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think we owe a great deal to the Senator from Louisiana for what he has been doing through the years in visiting different areas. As a matter of fact, I have expressed myself to members of the Committee on Foreign Relations to the effect that I hope that some year during an adjournment of Congress the Foreign Relations Committee might divide up the membership and visit every single country in the world during that one adjournment of Congress. I know it would be a monumental task, but I think it would be worth a great deal to us to show our interest in every single country.

I am sorry I was not present in the Chamber to hear what the Senator from Louisiana had to say about his report on Latin-America——

Mr. ELLENDER. I have just started.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Nevertheless, the Senator from Louisiana has said something. He was speaking when I entered the Chamber. I was attending a luncheon at which the mayor of West Berlin was present. We spent considerable time talking to him about one of the pressing problems at this time.

I have not had time to read the report of the Senator from Louisiana, which consists of about 500 pages. I am a member of the Latin-American Subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations, of which the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] is chairman. We are engaged in a rather long, and I believe, thorough, study of Latin America. I am sure the report of the Senator from Louisiana will be most helpful. Regardless of what conclusions the Senator from Louisiana may have drawn from some of his long visits, he has given us a fine reporting job. I am sure it is true of other sections of the world, but I think the greatest benefit that comes out of such report is the fact—and this is particularly true of Latin America—that the people have regarded us as taking them for granted. There is considerable justification for such a feeling. So often we have spoken of our fast allies in the Western Hemisphere. We have boasted of the fact that we can count on them in the United Nations, and count on them in other places. The people of Latin America have come to regard us as taking them for granted. I think all of us have come to the realization, in the last year or so, that that kind of attitude on our part is not one which influences and makes friends of them.

I think that the mere fact that the distinguished Senator from Louisiana was willing to take his time to go to each of these countries and to devote more time than the average Senator in making a trip of that kind finds it possible to devote to each particular country, certainly is a demonstration of the fact that we are more than just a little concerned with Latin America. The Latin American countries are our good neighbors. We want them to be, and we want them to continue to be our good neighbors, and we want to be a good neighbor to them.

I think the trip of the Senator from Louisiana certainly was a manifestation of that kind of attitude, and I commend him for it. I express my personal thanks to the Senator for doing such a great service for our Nation.

Mr. ELLENDER. I thank the Senator from Alabama. I wish to say to him that in addition to the report, to which the subcommittee has access, the subcommittee may also have the use of the diary I kept throughout my complete inspection trip. I did not put the whole diary into the report, because it would have made it too voluminous. In addition, I have a great deal of material which has been classified, which would be of great benefit to the committee. I shall be glad to let the committee have all of this data.

I also wish to say to my good friend from Alabama that no one accompanied me on this trip, as I said a while ago, not even a secretary. The report was written by me, with the aid of my own office force.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Following the return of the Senator from the trip.

Mr. ELLENDER. That is correct. Furthermore, I may add that the entire cost of the trip to the Government was a little over $1,500. The cost to the Government was $1,025 for actual travel expenses, and about $500 for other expenses. The rest I paid out of my own pocket.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I think it ought to be said that while there may be disagreement at times with the Senator from Louisiana as to the conclusions he has reached, there can be no disagreement as to the integrity of the senior Senator from Louisiana. The fact that the Senator embarks on these expeditions every year, usually going alone, undertaking a good deal of factfinding at his own expense, and returning with a detailed report, speaks well for the senior Senator from Louisiana and the activity in which he has been engaged.

I think the reports the Senator has made in the years since I have been a Member of the Senate have been not only outstanding, but also very worthwhile.

I express the belief it is unfortunate that we did not pay more attention to some of the recommendations of the senior Senator from Louisiana. I am glad to note that the chairman of the subcommittee dealing with Latin American affairs, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN], also a member of the committee, and the distinguished Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS], are present in the Chamber. My reason for mentioning the Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] is a statement made by the Senator from Oregon to the Senator from Louisiana, with which the Senator from Louisiana concurred, to the effect that in their belief there were too many military missions in Latin America.

I am recalling to the attention of the Senate at this time the very noteworthy speech made by the Senator from Florida in Miami at a banquet attended by President Arturo Frondizi of the Argentine Republic, in which he at that time made a somewhat similar recommendation.

I have a question: Is the Senator from Louisiana aware of the fact that for many years many of the members of the military missions in Latin America have been operating under a law which gives them special privileges, and in certain areas allows them additional emoluments of office, and also the right to hold office in the country to which they are assigned?

Mr. ELLENDER. In two or three countries I did come across that situation. I learned that certain people are receiving additional emoluments.

Mr. MANSFIELD. From the country to which they are accredited.

Mr. ELLENDER. Yes. I discovered that in quite a few countries in South and Central America and the people there are not very happy about having these military missions present. Our own people say, "It would be better to send them back home."

In the recommendations contained in my report I have stated specifically:

I recommend an immediate reduction in the overall emphasis on military aid. It has long been my feeling that the United States has no business trying to inflict large armed forces upon the struggling economies of underdeveloped nations.

Nevertheless that is what we are doing, not only in South and Central America, but also, as I pointed out in last year's report, in the Near East and the Far East.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Would the Senator recommend that greater concentration be placed upon economic assistance—of the right kind, of course?

Mr. ELLENDER. Does the Senator refer to South and Central America?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Yes; to Latin America.

Mr. ELLENDER. I pointed out in my current report that the people of South and Central America, in my humble judgment, do not want charity. They want loans, so that they themselves will be able to build up their economies.

There are only five countries in South and Central America, as I recall, which received grants during fiscal 1958. The rest of the countries have received technical assistance, and of course a little economic aid through the technical assistance program.

As I pointed out in my report, when I visited these countries in 1952 I discovered that much of the technical aid assistance was being used contrary to the intent of Congress. Money appropriated for the use of technicians was being used for capital improvements. In my judgment, technical aid should be limited to showing people how to do things. The actual construction, for instance, of buildings goes beyond the province of technical aid.

On my visit this year I found that only in a few countries are there still violations of the rules set out in the law, in my opinion.

In my report in 1952 I showed that much of the technical aid money was not used for the purpose specified but for economic aid. As a result, the Development Loan Fund was established. Since the Development Loan Fund was created and put into operation I have found only a few instances where money which had been appropriated for technical assistance was being used for investment. My report shows two or three specific instances of this. For instance, in one country we have furnished or are now furnishing $1,100 per unit to pay for bricks, mortar, and other things in order to build low-cost homes.

I am not saying that this is a bad program. It is probably doing a great deal of good. However, my point is that such programs do not qualify as technical aid. The technical aid program was never intended to embrace such projects.

Such programs should come under the Development Loan Fund, and not under the technical assistance program. If we could correct some of those evils—which I hope will be the case—the technical aid program would become more effective, because it is teaching the people how to make better use of their resources.

In South and Central America we also have the Import-Export Bank, which is lending a great deal of money. Other institutions are lending money in that area. However, I am suggesting that some new type bank be established. This new bank would be financed by the United States and would be operated under our supervision by the people of South and Central America, for their benefit. I also propose that branches be established in all Latin American countries, and that their primary purpose should be to loan money to small local businessmen. In my judgment, this new-type bank would do a great deal of good, because we would be helping the little people in those countries, the people who will generally help the masses of the people.

As I point out in my report, the great difficulty in South and Central America is that notwithstanding all the money we have spent in the past, and all the investments that have been made by the people of the United States and others, much of the profit does not go to the masses of the people. It usually makes the rich richer, while the poor stand still. I point that out in my report.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I am quite sure that this report will be a useful source document for the Morse subcommittee, which is now getting under way and is undertaking a 2-year survey of our relations with Latin America. Again, let me say that I am delighted that a man of such great integrity and honesty as the senior Senator from Louisiana has brought before the Senate, as well as before the Foreign Relations Committee, such a detailed and comprehensive report based upon his 2-months' visit to all the countries of Latin America, with the exception of Bolivia and Paraguay, as I understand.

The Senator is to be commended.

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. SMATHERS. The Senator suggested that there should be a bank, that we would participate in it, and that representatives of each of the Latin American countries would also participate. Does the Senator contemplate that this bank would take the place of the proposed inter-American bank?

Mr. ELLENDER. No; I am not saying that at all. This bank would be in addition to those now in effect. It would be a supplement to the program now being carried on, so that the small businessmen of South and Central America could say, "This is ours. This is for our use." It would be more of a help to small business than anything else. The Senator is familiar with the interest rates in South and Central America.

Mr. SMATHERS. They are enormous.

Mr. ELLENDER. They are too high. A small businessman cannot possibly make a start. If it were possible for us to create a bank which would assist the small businessman, I think it would go far toward helping the masses of the people. However, as can be seen in my report, I have attached a few strings to the operation of the proposed bank.

Mr. SMATHERS. I agree with the Senator that there should be restrictions.

I firmly agree with the Senator in his conclusion that the trouble with so much of our aid heretofore has been that it has tended to help those who already had enough, and enable them to get more, while the people who had too little continued to have too little. The question is, How can we generate a system which will build up a stronger economy and a higher per capita income among all the people, while at the same time providing better education, and better health for all the people? As the Senator so ably points out in his report, once there is established a climate of stability, we shall have political stability, and private investment from outside will be made.

I congratulate the Senator on the report he is making. I hope many Senators will take the opportunity to acquaint themselves with the facts set forth in the report.

Mr. ELLENDER. I thank the Senator.

Prior to 1955, I concerned myself primarily with the embassy operations of our Government overseas. However, as I was able to gain experience, during the course of my inspections, it has been possible for me to cover more ground in the time allotted for my travels. Thus, in connection with my current report covering foreign operations in Latin America, as has also been the case in my last three reports, I not only inspected our embassy operations but also operations of the U.S. Information Service, the International Cooperation Administration, the military attachés and the military assistance advisory groups located in the countries of Central and South America, as well as some of the Republics in the West Indies.

During my tour of Central and South America I visited all countries with the exception of Paraguay and Bolivia. In addition, I found time to visit British Honduras, British Guiana, Trinidad, the Dominican Republic, Haiti, and Cuba. I was gone for a total of 51 days, leaving the United States on October 26 and returning on December 15, 1958. In 1952, I made an inspection tour of practically all of those same countries.

Mr. President, my current report on Latin America consists essentially of three parts, and includes the following:

In the first part I have summed up my general conclusions deduced from my inspection and from the analysis of the answers to the questionnaires I sent to each of the U.S. Government agencies operating in these countries.

In the second part I have enumerated specific recommendations concerning improvements which I believe can, and should be, made in various U.S. operations in the Latin America area.

In the third part of my report, which comprises the great bulk of the data I obtained in each country, I have detailed in brief narrative descriptive form the work and operations of the various U.S. agencies, and have followed this narrative with exhibits, statistical data, project descriptions, and other pertinent information.

Mr. President, I point out that in many of the Latin American countries I again found forces at work which are not unlike those in other areas of the world and which, perhaps for lack of a better name, can all be classified under the general term "nationalism."

In the Near East, in southeast Asia—in fact, in much of Asia and Africa—these forces have resulted primarily from years of economic exploitation and political colonialism practiced by European countries.

In my humble opinion, there is not a question of doubt that the longstanding domination by these foreign powers produced the bubbling caldron of emotions which has boiled over more than once, and which gives every indication of boiling over again.

The explanation for the bitterness and the ill feeling prevailing in these underdeveloped countries of the Eastern Hemisphere is readily apparent. However, the reasons for the existence of similar conditions in our own hemisphere amongst our neighbors in Latin America are not readily identifiable.

It is with regret that I am compelled to report to the Senate and to the people of our great Nation that the good neighbor policy which had been put into effect in 1936 is now considered to be a policy of "good neighbor" in name only by the vast number of peoples of the American Republics. That our vaunted good neighbor policy is not held in high esteem by the people of Latin America is all too evident in the events of the past months which are now recorded in the annals of history. We have only to review what has happened here in the past year to realize that something must be done by the leaders of the Western Hemisphere if this policy is once again to be a living thing.

The shocking treatment accorded Vice President and Mrs. Nixon on their visit to Peru and Venezuela, the recent revolution in Cuba, the student strike in Mexico—all of these, Mr. President, serve notice that strong, often violent, and, unfortunately, frequently misunderstood forces are present in Latin America.

While visiting our friends in Latin America I made inquiries and pressed for specific examples of American neglect or economic discrimination, and those most critical of American policies were unable to provide them.

In fact, Mr. President, many of the complainers simply referred to the tremendous aid that we made available to the countries of the Eastern Hemisphere, and asked the question: "Why were we so neglected?"

In my humble opinion, the underlying reason behind the growing dislike of the United States is but another reflection of a prevailing desire among the Latin American people to better their way of life.

Mr. President, it seemed apparent to me that there is a broadening belief among these people that since many of the raw materials which feed U.S. industries come from the nations of Latin America, the United States is, in effect, living off the sweat of the brow of Latin Americans.

It was exceedingly difficult, if not impossible, for me to endeavor to convince many of our severest critics in that part of the world that U.S. private enterprise pays—and pays well—for the raw materials it purchases from the American Republics.

Furthermore, Mr. President, I believe that our critics often have overlooked that the American firms operating in Latin America, particularly, in the development of natural resources and manufacturing, have generally adopted an enlightened attitude toward their employees, providing hospitals, schools, good housing, fair pay and other benefits that are known only to the people of our own country.

However, notwithstanding the altruistic motives of the American firms operating in Latin America, the cold facts are that the profits derived from sales to, and investments by, our U.S. firms are not generally used to benefit the masses of the people. An example of this is personified in the relatively developed country of Venezuela where, even though American capital has brought tremendous advances in the living standards of local employees of U.S. firms, there remains considerable poverty amongst the masses of the people.

Mr. President, there are many Americans who believe in the so-called "trickle down" theory, that is, if the industrial firms of a country profit, then a good portion of the profits should trickle down to the masses of the people. Although this may be true to some extent in a highly industrialized economy such as ours, it is evident, in fact, apparent, that such does not follow in the case of those countries that are not as highly developed. Labor is not well organized and the governments do not try to enforce minimum labor requirements. Their tax structures are inadequate, as my report shows.

In my travels throughout the underdeveloped countries of the Eastern Hemisphere I have observed millions and millions of dollars of our economic aid going into the pockets of the wealthy inhabitants, while the masses remained as impoverished as they have always been.

In the Latin American countries the situation seems to be identical, with the only difference being that United States firms develop resources which result in providing economic aid indirectly, rather than the U.S. Government rendering grant aid directly as is the case with the underdeveloped countries of the Eastern Hemisphere.

Mr. President, in my humble opinion, if there is a deprivation of the masses and the economic wealth created is not trickling down to the masses, the fault does not lie with the American firms who are operating in these countries, or with our Government, but, evidently, it is caused by the internal economic pattern existing in these countries, where the rich get richer, while the poor get poorer.

Mr. President, as long as these conditions prevail, so it will follow that the economic gains will be directed into the pockets of the rich instead of to the masses of the people. Anything done by our Government or through investments made by Americans in this area will inevitably benefit only the wealthy.

I do not mean to imply that the future of Latin America is hopeless, for the potentials creating great wealth are present. All that is needed is the proper attitude on the part of the moneyed classes of these great countries to the south of us.

Mr. President, I want to emphasis that whereas Latin America needs assistance, the peoples of these great countries are proud and they do not desire charity.

It is my firm belief that long-term loans for economic development should continue to be made, but they should be conditioned upon the proper assurances that the proceeds will be used to finance projects and facilities beneficial to all the people.

In fact, Mr. President, I believe that in making these loans, consideration, aside from normal criteria, should also be given to conditioning the disbursement of such loans to the tax laws of the country to whom the loan is made. In brief, I feel that the burden of taxation must be placed on the shoulders of those who are able to pay, if the reforms I suggest are to come to pass.

Mr. President, I am aware that this suggestion is vulnerable and the argument can rightly be advanced that the tying of such strings to a loan would amount to infringement upon the sovereignty of our neighbors. However, departing from cold logic, it would appear to me that the requirement of internal tax reform as a means of assuring due repayment would be nothing more than the rightful prerogative of any prudent lender.

Mr. President, fortunately, exploitation of the peoples of Latin America by American firms is today the exception, rather than the rule. For this we should all be grateful. However, as an additional safeguard, I would further recommend that the American private enterprise seeking to do business in Latin America should be compelled by the U.S. Government to meet certain basic standards of conduct, which should be designed to assure the payment of fair wages, and to hasten economic development of the nation involved for the benefit of all the people.

In my humble opinion, an enlightened local business community must be developed—a business community which understands that the payment of fair wages, the raising of living standards, the extension of mass medical and educational benefits to the poor are not only desirable from a humanitarian point of view, but vitally necessary if the pent-up demand for a better way of life is not to explode violently and destroy those who today feed and grow fat at the expense of the poor.

While there is an apparent trend among our own diplomatic and foreign aid officials to recognize the seriousness of what is obviously a lack of responsibility for the welfare of all the people among the ruling classes of Latin America, I must reiterate that United States economic assistance is by no means a panacea.

Mr. President, the correction of what could become a desperate situation can only come from the businessmen of Latin America, and it is they who must be convinced that it will accrue to their ultimate benefit if the living standards of the masses are elevated.

In my judgment, our needs and the needs of our Latin America neighbors, if properly directed, can be the basis of mutual growth, stability and prosperity. We must revitalize the good-neighbor policy—we must restore the spirit in which it was conceived. Truly, the two continents of the Western Hemisphere are neighbors, and neighbors we must remain. It is not only the factors of geography that make it so, but our origins and our aspirations are essentially the same. We are joined by a common bond of history and a common desire for freedom. Our ideals are founded on the dignity of man, and our beliefs in the rights of the individual are so sacred that we are willing to sacrifice our all to protect them.

Mr. President, I feel confident that because of the ideals held dear by countries of the Western Hemisphere that it is not likely that any of them will succumb to the evils of a totalitarian state.

I do not make any pretense about having all of the answers for solving the problems facing our neighbors in Latin America. However, I feel that the 21 recommendations listed in my report, if implemented, should make some small contribution in arriving at a solution to some of these problems. I am hopeful that the parties to whom they are directed will take heed and give them every consideration.

Mr. President, it is not my purpose or desire to discuss my conclusions and my recommendations in more detail. I ask unanimous consent that my conclusions and recommendations be made a part of the RECORD and that they be printed following my remarks.

There being no objection, the conclusions and recommendations were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONCLUSIONS

I again found forces at work in much of Latin America which are not unlike those seething in other areas of the world and which, perhaps for lack of a better name, can all be lumped together under the general term "nationalism."

In the Near East, in southeast Asia—in fact, in much of Asia and Africa—these forces have resulted primarily from years of European economic exploitation and political colonialism.

There, longstanding domination by foreign powers produced the bubbling caldron of emotions which has already boiled over more than once, and which gives every indication of boiling over again.

The explanation for the bitterness and ill-feeling in those areas of the world are readily apparent.

The reasons for the existence of similar conditions in Latin America, on the other hand, are not so easily identifiable.

However, I am compelled to report to the committee that although the good neighbor policy has been in effect since 1936, there is a large—and growing—body of public opinion in the American Republics which seems convinced that the United States is today a good neighbor in name only.

When pressed for specific examples of American neglect or economic discrimination, those most critical of American policies were unable to provide them. Many complainants simply referred to the tremendous aid that we made available to countries of the Eastern Hemisphere, and asked the question: "Why were we so neglected?"

In my opinion, the underlying reason behind a growing dislike of the United States is but another reflection of a prevailing desire among the Latin American peoples to better their way of life.

It is unfortunate, but, in most cases, true, that our neighbors to the south are envious of the prestige, power, wealth, and economic productivity of the United States. There is also a broadening belief that since many of the raw materials which feed U.S. industries come from the nations of Latin America, the United States is, in effect, living off the sweat of Latin America's brow.

It is difficult, if not impossible, to convince many of our severest critics in that part of the world that U.S. private enterprise pays, and pays well, for the raw materials it purchases from the American Republics.

In addition, while payment is ample, it is often overlooked that American firms operating in Latin America, particularly in the development of natural resources and manufacturing, have generally adopted an enlightened attitude toward their employees, providing hospitals, schools, good housing, at their own expense, and fair pay.

However, even though it is true that U.S. firms doing business here are not exploiting the area, the cold facts are that the bulk of Latin American profits derived from sales to, and investments by, U.S enterprises are not generally used to benefit the masses of the people.

Thus, even in such relatively developed countries as Venezuela, where American capital has sparked tremendous advances in living standards of employees of U.S firms there remains considerable poverty among the masses of the people.

As the violence directed against Vice President and Mrs. Nixon demonstrated, much of Latin America believes the United States is stealing its natural resources.

In my opinion, if there is theft involved, it takes place after a fair price for Latin American materials is paid by American purchasers and before these profits trickle into Latin American treasuries.

In other words, in the majority of Latin American countries economic development has brought more wealth to the wealthy and very little to the masses of the people.

Basically, this situation cannot be corrected by the United States. Certainly we should not attempt to correct it by extending wholesale economic aid to this area. As a matter of fact, as my report amply demonstrates, much of the economic and related assistance already made available to this part of the world has, as in the case of economic development, further enriched the well-to-do, with only a pittance trickling down to those who need help the most.

We certainly must not place ourselves in the position of actually fostering dissatisfaction and unrest while attempting to do just the opposite.

And yet, under existing conditions and without far-reaching Latin American internal reforms, further U.S. economic assistance is destined to produce that result.

So long as existing conditions prevail, so long as established internal economic patterns exist—patterns which automatically direct the fruits of economic gains into the pockets of the rich instead of into the thirsty mouths, the sick bodies, and hungry bellies of the poor—U.S. aid will inevitably benefit only the wealthy.

In effect, we might well be helping to forge a weapon to be used against us at some future time.

This does not mean, however, that the future of Latin America is hopeless.

This area is potentially one of the wealthiest parts of the world. It abounds in natural resources—petroleum, iron ore, nitrates, lead, zinc, and countless others, all of which are mostly owned and controlled by the countries in which they are found. With very few exceptions, they cannot be explored or otherwise developed except by concessions from the state. In other words, in most instances, the state owns all resources beneath the soil.

These resources, which are ostensibly the property of all the people if properly used, can bring not only a constantly rising standard of living to the people of Latin America, but assurance of continued economic well-being to the United States.

I wish to emphasize that Latin America needs assistance, but she does not want charity.

Long-term loans for economic development are being, and should continue to be, made available. However, they should be conditioned upon proper assurances that the proceeds will be used to finance projects and facilities beneficial to all the people. Consideration should also be given to conditioning the disbursement of such loans or changes in Latin American tax laws—laws which are either extremely lax, or which are honored more often in their breach than their observance. In short, the burden of taxation must be placed on the shoulders of those able to pay, if the reforms I advise are to come to pass.

It will be argued that the imposition of such conditions would infringe upon the sovereignty of our Latin American friends. In one view, they perhaps would, but, if the loans were properly secured, the requirement of internal tax reform as a means of assuring due repayment would, in my opinion, be nothing more than the rightful prerogative of any prudent lender.

I would further recommend that American private enterprise seeking to do business in Latin America be compelled by the U.S. Government to meet certain basic standards of conduct, designed to assure the payment of fair wages, to preclude the reaping of vast or unconscionable profits, and to hasten economic development of the nation involved for the benefit of all the people.

Fortunately, exploitation by American firms is today the exception rather than the rule.

Development is no longer synonymous with exploitation.

Assurance must be given that this will remain the case.

An enlightened local business community must be developed—a business community which understands that the payment of fair wages, the raising of living standards, the extension of mass medical and educational benefits to the poor and humble are not only desirable from a humanitarian point of view, but vitally necessary if the pent-up demand for a better way of life is not to explode violently and destroy those who today feed and grow fat at the expense of the poor.

While there is an apparent trend among our own diplomatic and foreign aid officials to recognize the seriousness of what is obviously a lack of responsibility for the welfare of all the people among the ruling classes of Latin America, it must be emphasized again that U.S. economic assistance is not a panacea.

The correction of what could become a desperate situation can come only from the businessmen of Latin America. They must be convinced that it will be to their ultimate benefit if wages are raised and basic social institutions—schools, hospitals, decent housing, etc.—are fostered.

If these were accomplished, the benefits would be twofold: (1) A rising standard of living, providing, ultimately, for vastly enlarged markets, plus increased consumer purchasing power, and (2) a satisfied population, bringing stability to governments, and the creation of a climate attractive to private investment.

Finally, I wish to make it clear that I do not urge these reforms in the spirit of criticism, but, rather, with the full realization that the continued well-being of our own country is tied directly to the fortunes of our Latin American neighbors. I sometimes wish it were possible to enmesh, in some way, our own economy with those of the countries to the south of us.

The United States needs materials for its factories, outlets for its manufactured products, the assurance of growing mutual trade with the nations to the south. In fact, I would venture to again say that if the wheels of our great industrial facilities are to continue to turn at their present rate we will be compelled to look to the south of us for raw materials.

In my judgment, our needs and the needs of our Latin American neighbors, if properly directed, can be the basis of mutual growth, stability, and prosperity. We must revitalize the good neighbor policy—we must restore the spirit in which it was conceived.

Truly, the two continents of the Western Hemisphere are neighbors, and neighbors we must remain. The factors of geography alone so dictate.

Our aspirations are similar; our origins are essentially the same. We are joined by a common bond of history and a common desire for freedom. Our ideals are founded on a spiritual concept of man. Our belief in the rights of the individual is so sacred that we willingly sacrifice our all to protect them.

These concepts, of themselves, offer assurance that no part of the Western Hemisphere is likely to succumb to a totalitarian state.

Above all, just as the United States and our Latin American neighbors share a joint past, so must we share a joint future.

As neighbors, linked by common bonds of friendship, history, tradition, and culture, we must join hands today, as partners in tomorrow.

RECOMMENDATIONS

The following recommendations, dealing with Embassy operations, the U.S. information program, the International Cooperation Administration programs, the military attaché offices, military assistance advisory groups, and other governmental missions, are based upon the data and observations which the committee will find outlined in detail in the country-by-country reports which follow.

EMBASSY OPERATIONS

1. I recommend that more freedom be given U.S. ambassadors in the field, particularly in the handling of personnel and funds of the Embassy, and that more reliance be placed upon their judgment.

I found in many instances that our ambassadors have their hands tied by the State Department at the Washington level. If the State Department has sufficient confidence in a chief of mission to entrust him with the administration of our affairs in a foreign country, then it should have enough confidence in his patriotism and commonsense to permit him to do the job as he may think best, within broad limits. I again found, generally, that there is a tendency for the Washington bureaucracy to establish one overall pattern for the embassies to follow, with little or no flexibility permitted.

Two specific examples illustrate my point.

First, the chief of mission does not have the authority to assign personnel among the various sections of the Embassy. This lack of authority precludes any day-to-day adjustment of duties among the various Embassy sections, and, in addition, denies to the Ambassador the authority over functions performed by officers who are otherwise subject to him, upon whose performances his reputation is dependent in large measure, and upon whose information his decisions must be based.

Second, a more or less uniform reporting system imposed upon all missions, regardless of location, status, or problems peculiar to the specific areas where they are located, often imposes an unnecessary workload on otherwise limited staffs, or, in the alternative, requires the undue expansion of staffs, at considerable cost to the Government. Much unnecessary reporting could be eliminated if our chiefs of missions had the power to so direct.

2. I recommend that chiefs of missions be vested with the right of review and veto over all military assistance programs, plus those of the U.S. Information Service and the International Cooperation Administration. The chief of mission is the top-ranking representative of the U.S. Government in any country. Within a given country, the chief of mission is responsible for the conduct of the foreign policy of the United States; upon his shoulders rests, for all practical purposes, the total burden of U.S. diplomacy.

Denying a chief of mission the right of review over, and veto of, projects affecting relations between the nation to which he is accredited and the United States (and certainly the programs administered by USIA, ICA, and MAAG have important and direct effects upon that relationship) is, in effect, to make the Ambassador responsible for consequences over which he has no control.

Our chief of mission should also be empowered to fire all personnel in excess of what he deems to be necessary. He should be consulted if more personnel is to be provided in any of our missions under his jurisdiction.

3. I recommend that administrative support for all U.S. agencies or missions—including military personnel—on duty abroad be provided by the administrative section of the diplomatic mission in which those agencies are located. That would also cover the procurement of living quarters for all of our personnel. As is now the case, our personnel vie with each other for the rental of homes to live in, and rents go up in proportion to the rental allowance provided.

In many instances, the International Cooperation Administration (USOM) and U.S. Information Service maintain administrative staffs, separate and apart from that operated by the Embassy, and separate and apart from one another. I call particular attention to the administrative costs for some of our ICA missions, most of which engage in technical assistance programs.

Since all the money required to pay these expenses is coming from the same pocket—Uncle Sam's—I see no reason why the Embassy could not handle all administrative duties for all U.S. agencies, including the disbursing of salaries, preparation of budgets, etc.

4. I recommend that the Appropriations Committee require that a fair sampling of officials from the field be present to testify on and justify individual items affecting their posts during the committee's consideration of State Department budgets.

These officials are the frontline troops, so to speak; they should be accorded an opportunity to freely and fully express their views at firsthand.

In addition, it is my judgment that the committee's work could be considerably facilitated if the independent and unrestricted testimony of such witnesses were available.

I submit this recommendation fully aware of its possible cost. However, I am of the opinion that, in the long run, the initial cost of transporting a reasonable number of such persons to the United States for this purpose would be more than offset by savings which could be made in program expenses. In addition, the Department of State, I understand, usually requires that chiefs of missions return to Washington at least once a year for consultation. This usual trip could be scheduled to coincide with congressional consideration of the appropriate budget requests, if an effort were made to do so.

5. I recommend that the Departments of Agriculture and State reevaluate the justification for maintaining agricultural attachés in Latin America.

Generally, I found that most of the operations of agricultural attachés are so much wasted motion, as specific instances in the attached country-by-country reports demonstrate.

Reports on crop production and market outlooks could be done by a member of the Embassy staff as was done in the past, thus reducing expenses in the field. As I pointed out in some of my country reports, there has been no increase in imports of surplus commodities. In most countries, food importations decreased and our agricultural attachés engage in merely making statistical reports.

U.S. INFORMATION SERVICE

6. I recommend that the press programs of the U.S. Information Service in Central and South America be terminated at once, as they are ineffective.

7. Television and radio programs in this area should be reevaluated, with emphasis placed upon the use of such media only in areas where receivers are generally available. In some large cities of Latin America, where television receivers are common, television programs could well be continued. However, to offer television programs in areas where receptionability is only nominal, and to conduct radio broadcasts in areas where receivers are regarded as curiosities, amount to wasted motion and money.

8. I specifically urge that the Information Service tailor its activities on a country-by-country basis, emphasizing the use of mass media only where obviously justifiable. In addition, in those areas where literacy rates are low—and there are many in Latin America—the publication of pamphlets, etc., should immediately be discontinued, and emphasis shifted to other more useful purposes.

9. I also doubt the effectiveness of the so-called intelligentsia approach, whereby magazine and subscriptions to other periodicals are offered free of charge to a selected few community leaders and other public officials. In most cases, such officials are well able to afford to purchase their own periodicals; in any event, USIS-donated materials are almost universally regarded as propaganda, and, thus, are without substantial effectiveness.

10. I particularly urge the Information Services to conduct its operations with more finesse; the rapier is often more effective than the bludgeon. In most areas of South and Central America, the Information Service has become synonymous with propaganda and, therefore, has either lost, or is rapidly losing, its usefulness.

11. I recommend that the USIS salary structure be reexamined. I found instances of public affairs officers drawing total salaries, including rental allowances and hardship allowances, in the vicinity of $20,000 per year. The following illustrate my point:

(1) USIS/Venezuela, public affairs officer:

Salary	$12,120
Post allowance	3,600
Quarters	6,000
Transportation allowance	125
Representation allowance	48
Total	21,893

(2) USIS/Haiti, public affairs officer:

Salary	$11,770
Quarters	3,000
Hardship allowance	1,765
Post allowance	480
Total	17,015

This officer, incidentally, supervises a mission staffed by one other American officer and four local employees.

Several other examples of large salaries and expenses include:

Public affairs officer, Panama, $18,350.

Public affairs officer, Nicaragua, $18,336.

Public affairs officer, Buenos Aires, $18,253.

Public affairs officer, Havana, Cuba, $19,253.

It should be pointed out that the Director of the U.S. Information Agency in Washington draws a total salary of $21,000 per year.

12. I also recommend the elimination of the post of specialized media officer. In almost every case, the staffs of the diplomatic missions can make press material available for local newspapers. (See recommendation 6.)

13. One of the bright lights of our information program in Latin America is the encouragement given to the establishment of binational centers. These are corporations formed under the laws of the country in which they are located, and organized by citizens of that country along with U.S. citizens.

The primary purpose of these centers is to provide facilities for the teaching of English, business courses, and the presentation of cultural programs, etc. Students pay a fixed fee for instruction. For the most part, the centers are self-sufficient.

These binational centers are creating more goodwill for the United States through Central and South America than any program now being conducted by USIS.

Therefore, it is my recommendation that these centers be encouraged. However, the United States should not endeavor to take over the operation of these centers. Such an attempt would destroy their effectiveness.

I was informed by some USIS personnel in Latin America that in certain instances these binational centers are administered by a U.S. grantee who is paid directly by the State Department. If true, in my judgment this is a direct violation of, if not the letter then surely the intent of, the exchange programs as now authorized.

However, even in the alternative, and assuming that such administrative grantees are being paid by U.S. Information Service, then I think this equally unconscionable.

The success of these binational centers has been predicated on the theory that the less U.S. governmental interference the better.

In many places these binational centers are going concerns which are completely self-sufficient. I can see neither reason nor excuse for USIS or the State Department to try to take over any sort of control of this program, or even to assist in paying for the erection of buildings to house these centers. Some of our "eager beavers" are suggesting that funds derived from our surplus disposal program be used for that purpose.

So long as these centers are under local control, they will remain effective exponents of our way of life and the principles for which we stand. However, once the Information Service and the Department of State involve themselves in the conduct, financing, or housing of binational centers, then immediately such centers become suspect. Their objectivity is open to question, and their effectiveness is automatically impaired.

Books, teaching materials, and, on occasion, teachers can and should be made available. However, every effort should be made to preserve the independence of these centers, free and clear of any semblance of U.S. Government control.

14. I recommend that our educational exchange program be expanded. That could be accomplished by the elimination of some of the programs I have suggested. More students from Central and South America should have an opportunity to come to the United States, and more of our students should be given an opportunity to learn about our friends to the south.

I further recommend that, insofar as the Latin American exchange students are concerned, great pains be taken to select students from the so-called lower classes. Economic status should not be made the criteria for further education; in addition, the offspring of poverty-stricken families should be encouraged to better themselves in order to return among their neighbors and assist in raising their living, health, and educational standards.

A studied effort should be made to avoid associating the exchange program with the prevailing tendency in some areas of Latin America to further educate the educated and ignore the schooling of the masses.

INTERNATIONAL COOPERATION ADMINISTRATION

15. I recommend that a cooperative loan program exclusively for use in Central and South America be inaugurated. This program should be participated in by the United States and the countries to the south of us. It should cater principally to small businesses and should supplement all other agencies or banks now established for extending credit in that area. A control bank should be established in one of the countries to the south of us, with branch banks in other countries participating in the effort.

I wish to repeat for the sake of emphasis that a new loan program of the type recommended need not interfere with the Development Loan Fund or any other program now in effect. It would simply augment them. In addition, it would have the effect of stimulating local investment within their own countries by the businessmen of Central and South America.

Because of a lack of capital, much of the technical assistance we make available to our friends in Latin America cannot be utilized. Unfortunately, I found a tendency among some of our planners to stretch the technical aid program in such a way as to provide the needed capital investment. This practice is directly contrary to the spirit, intent, and purpose of technical aid, and it should be terminated at once.

If capital investment of any kind is required, it should be provided from sources created for that purpose, such as I have recommended above, for example—not by violating the intent of Congress. (See specifically recommendation 16, below.)

I suggest that certain conditions be attached to all loans with a view toward improving the plight of the masses. Some may contend that this would amount to interference by the United States in the internal affairs of a foreign nation. I must admit that such a contention is essentially valid. However, it is my deep conviction that no lasting benefits will ever accrue to the masses of the people of South and Central America—those whom we should assist—unless those in business are made to pay their fair proportion of taxes and provide a reasonable wage to workers.

Any economic development effort should be essentially a program by Latin Americans, for Latin Americans, to benefit all Latin Americans.

16. Again I wish to call to the attention of the committee the practice of many of our ICA administrators of using technical aid funds for capital investments. I found cases where as much as $1,100 per unit were advanced for building homes for workers under the guise of technical assistance. Such a practice is inexcusable, and those responsible should be made to account for such a violation of the law.

Many servicios are also furnished money that is used for capital investments. This practice should be stopped.

I recommend that many programs should be discontinued because they have passed the demonstration point. In other words, we have shown the good effects of certain programs, but we are still contributing money for demonstration purposes. A classic example is our contribution to extend water facilities in many villages in Venezuela.

17. The cost of administering these programs is entirely too large. Most, or practically all, of the administrative work could be handled by the administrative sections of our embassies abroad, as I have previously pointed out.

18. It is my view that many technicians sent abroad are not competent. Some are, doubtless, political appointees with little experience. Some effort should be made at once to evaluate the competence of all technicians—and we have quite a horde of them.

19. I recommend that aid of any kind to British colonies in the Americas be halted immediately. British Honduras, British Guiana, and Trinidad are all under British control and are, therefore, primarily British responsibilities. I see absolutely no reason for the United States to spend any funds in these areas.

Actually, we are simply being asked to come in and revitalize areas that have been milked dry over the years by British exploitation.

In this connection, I was informed that the program in Trinidad has been inaugurated over the protest of the head of our mission there. Efforts are now being made to extend aid on many of the islands in the West Indies.

MILITARY ATTACHÉS

20. I again recommend that the activities of our military attachés should be unified. Clerical staffs and motor vehicles should be pooled. I do not see how it is possible for the many attachés we have all over South and Central America to keep busy. There is much loss of manpower. These men in uniform could certainly perform more valuable services for their country and every effort should be made to see that they do.

I again call the committee's attention to the fact that while Army and Air Force personnel have one paymaster the Navy has its own. There is no logical reason why one paymaster could not take care of the accounts of the three services.

MILITARY ASSISTANCE ADVISORY GROUPS

21. I recommend an immediate reduction in the overall emphasis on military aid. It has long been my feeling that the United States has no business trying to inflict large armed forces upon the struggling economies of underdeveloped nations.

The United States could, under appropriate circumstances, sell such military equipment to friendly nations as may be adequate to maintain internal security.

However, the United States should immediately reevaluate the need or necessity of maintaining advisory missions in the countries to the south of us. I found that we were not wanted in some countries, but we seem to persist in remaining there.

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ELLENDER. I yield.

Mr. DWORSHAK. For several years the Senator from Louisiana has rendered exceptional and outstanding service to the country, to Congress, and to the executive department by making annual inspection trips to various sections of the globe. Having traveled with the Senator in the fall of 1956 in southeast Asia, I am fully aware of the thoroughness with which he undertakes such assignments.

I regret that I was not present this afternoon to hear all of the Senator's comments on his Latin American trip last fall. Therefore, I should like to ask him whether he was able to discern in the Latin American countries any lack of a proper understanding of the foreign aid program advocated by our own Government in our efforts to cultivate good will in various parts of the world. What was the final conclusion which the Senator reached?

Mr. ELLENDER. Fortunately, I found that only five countries received grants in fiscal 1958. Most of the aid we have made available to the countries of South and Central America has been by way of technical assistance, and that program has worked very well. The only difficulty I found was that after we gave the people our technical assistance, there was the question of money: whether they could obtain sufficient funds in order to put into practice what they had learned from us.

In most cases the people go to the banks in their countries, where, as the distinguished junior Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS] knows, the rates of interest are simply enormous—from 10 to 12 percent, and with a little discount added. Thus many persons are unable to go into business, even after we have aided them by teaching them a skill.

With respect to the countries, such as Guatemala, which do receive assistance from us by way of grants, I find that when we start to make grants, then those countries will want as much as the traffic will bear. So I recommend, so far as South and Central America are concerned, that the United States restricts its assistance to technical aid and a loan program.

I have just advocated the establishment of a bank to be operated in South and Central America. The capital would be furnished by funds provided by the United States and funds provided by local people and governments. The main bank could be established in one of the countries of South or Central America, and branches could be established in all other countries participating in the program. The idea would be to provide an opportunity to obtain money at a fair rate of interest for those who want to start small businesses. If we could do this, then I am certain that more and more of the masses of the people would receive benefits from such a program.

As conditions are now, I am sorry to say that many of the wealthy persons in the countries to the south of us do not care much about the welfare of the poorer people; they simply look out for themselves. I spoke to many high officials of countries on my tour. They agree—and I have included this in my report—that whenever any effort is made by a new government to improve the lot of the poorer people by providing more schools, more hospitals, or anything else to benefit all the people, then the question arises, Where will the money come from? As we all know, it usually comes from those who are able to pay. Thus we find that it is the wealthy persons who—many times—are the ones who foment opposition to reform programs, and cause the overthrow of reformers.

I found that situation to be prevalent in many of the countries of South and Central America. It is not the masses of the people who cause all the trouble; it is those who are called upon to pay, by a fair assessment of taxes, who usually complain the loudest and block these needed reforms.
